Discrimination in denying or terminating employment

Closed-shop contract

The board may not order an employer to offer employment to one not a member of a union with which the employer has a valid contract under the terms of which the employer is required to select its employees from the members of such union.—Waterman Steamship Corporation v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.5, 103 F.2d 157, reversed on other grounds N. L. R. B. v. Waterman S. S. Corporation, 60 S.Ct. 493, 309 U.S. 206, 84 L.Ed. 704, rehearing denied 60 S.Ct. 611, 309 U.S. 696, 84 L.Ed. 1036.

Constructive discharge

Where employees were temporarily transferred to positions where working conditions were as good as where they originally worked, and hours and pay were the same, and employees elected to quit employer's service, and employer had sought to influence employees against organizing labor unions, employees should be tendered their former or substantially equivalent positions with full seniority rights, but are not entitled to compensation from the time they left employer's service on ground that they had been constructively discharged.—N. L. R. B. v. Waples-Platter Co., C.C.A.5, 140 F.2d 228.

68. U.S.—N. L. R. B. v. Winona Textile Mills, C.C.A.8, 160 F.2d 601.

Curtailment of overtime

National Labor Relations Board properly considered the discontinuance of overtime in determining whether employer had interfered with or coerced employees in the exercise of their statutory right, but where both union and nonunion employees were treated alike there was no discrimination against individual union workers and board was without power to require reimbursement of union workers by employer.—N. L. R. B. v. Winona Textile Mills, supra.

Death of discharged employee

The fact that employee who had been improperly discharged for union activity had died and could not as to this there is also authority to the contrary.[70]

The power of the board to order reinstatement extends to persons who have obtained other equivalent employment[71] where an order to such effect will effectuate the policies of the statute.[72] A reinstatement order in the case of one who has obtained substantially equivalent employment is a matter within the discretion of the board,[73] whose order must show that it has exercised its discretion and the reasons therefor;[74] and the fact that employees may hesitate to exercise their rights unless such orders are issued is a sufficient reason for their issuance.[75]

The board may order reinstatement of an employee with or without back pay where the employer is guilty of unfair labor practices in violation of the statute[76] and such action is necessary to effectuate the policies of the statute.[77] Reinstatement with or without back pay may be ordered as to employees discharged because of union activities and for the purpose of discouraging membership in the union.[78] Where a strike is caused by the employer-be reinstated did not preclude award of back pay.—N. L. R. B. v. Revlon Products Corporation, C.C.A.2, 144 F.2d 88.

Reinstated employee

Persons already reinstated should be excepted from reinstatement provision without impairing their rights to back pay.—Reliance Mfg. Co. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.7, 125 F.2d 311.

Death after reinstatement ordered

While National Labor Relations Act does not permit award of back pay to wrongfully discharged employee unless reinstated, back pay could properly be awarded to personal representative of discharged employee dying after board entered order for his reinstatement.—N. L. R. B. v. Hearst, C.C.A.9, 102 F.2d 658.

Reinstatement impossible

If reinstatement in compliance with order, which also contains a back-pay allowance, becomes impossible, the back pay obligation is nevertheless enforceable.—N. L. R. B. v. Employees on strike when statute enacted

Where employer's factory was closed because of strike before enactment of National Labor Relations Act, restoration of strikers to their employment by order of board could be effected only if employer had failed in its statutory duty to bargain collectively at some time after approval of the act, and before the employer had resumed normal operations of its factory with a full complement of production employees.—N. Union jurisdictional conflict

Where drivers' union had informed newspaper company that it would not haul newspapers unless company's circulation employees were members of union, and company thereafter transferred to temporary positions in other departments employees in circulation department who would not give up their membership in newspaper guild, fact that company might be compelled to close its plant because drivers would refuse to haul papers if company complied with order of board requiring reinstatement of transferred employees, did not preclude board from ordering reinstatement.—N. er's unfair labor practices, the board may order the reinstatement of the strikers,[79] and the board may order the reinstatement of an employee discharged solely because he participated in a strike against the employer.[80] It is not a valid objection to a reinstatement order as to employees discriminatorily discharged that they participated in a strike against the employer after their discharge,[81] that they failed to apply for reinstatement,[82] or that some of them have been reinstated.[83] Where the refusal to reinstate employees was discriminatory, the board may order their reëmployment although they had struck in sympathy with others whose discharge was found to be not illegal.[84]

The board may not order the reinstatement of employees where the employer has not committed an unfair labor practice in violation of the statute[85] or where the employee was lawfully discharged.[86] The reinstatement of employees discharged because of their illegal seizure and retention of their employer's property may not be ordered even though the employer is guilty of unfair labor practices[87]

Employee in a supervisory position

The reinstatement of shop foreman whose discharge was motivated by employer's hostility toward union which foreman represented would not be required in view of foreman's active connection with union and his known history of influencing employees in favor of the union in which he had a supervisory position.—Wells, Inc., v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.9, 162 F.2d 457.

Contract with craft union

Where employer improperly interfered with attempts of employees to have a plant-wide union in place of craft unions, employees who were discharged in conformity with an agreement between employer and craft union were properly ordered reinstated with back pay.—Corning Glass Works v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A. 2, 118 F.2d 625.

Nonunion strikers

The board, in ordering company to reinstate all employees who went on strike because of unfair labor practice, properly included in reinstatement order nonunion workers, those joining strike after it was originally called, and employees who were not eligible for membership in union calling strike.—N. L. R. B. v. Biles Coleman Lumber Co., C.C.A.9, 98 F. 2d 18.

Confidential employee

Fact that employer's striking secretary was excluded from the collective bargaining unit because she might have access to confidential information pertaining directly to employer's labor relations did not preclude her from receiving reinstatement and back pay, since the exclusion did not deprive her of the benefits of the National Labor Relations Act.—N. L. R. B. v. Poultrymen's Service Corp., C.C.A.3, 138 F.2d 204.

Notice of absence

Provision of employment contract requiring employees to give notice of intended absence from work was not intended to apply to absence from work due to strikes or to affect rights of striking employees to reinstatement in accordance with order.—Berkshire Knitting Mills v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.3, 139 F.2d 134, certiorari denied 64 S.Ct. 1158, 322 U.S. 747, 88 L.Ed. 1579.

Unlawful conditions

An employer's refusal to reinstate his striking employees unless they joined a company union warrants a reinstatement order as to such employees even though they failed to apply for reinstatement where such failure was caused by the employer's unlawful conditions.—Eagle-Picher Mining & Smelting Co. v. and has reëmployed some of those who participated in the illegal seizure of the plant.[88] Similarly the board may not order the reinstatement of employees discharged because of their participation in a strike on board a ship in violation of a mutiny statute even though the strike was precipitated by the employer's unfair labor practice.[89] It has been held that reinstatement may not be ordered as to employees discharged because they went on strike in violation of a contract with the employer not to strike and to submit differences to arbitration.[90] Similarly, where a minority of the employees strike because of a refusal by the employer to bargain with their representative and are discharged, it has been held that they are limited to their economic weapon and that the board may not order their reinstatement.[91] The power of the board to order reinstatement as to employees who have committed crimes or other unlawful acts is somewhat restricted.[92] One habitually intoxicated while at work where his intoxication represented a danger to the public should not be ordered reinstated even though he was discharged for other reasons and as part of an unfair labor practice.[93]

Employees charged with contempt

Order directing reinstatement of employees against whom employer had initiated contempt proceedings for violation of temporary injunction was not invalid where no finding of guilt was made as to striking employees in contempt proceedings.—N. L. R. B. v. Colten, C.C.A.6, 105 F. 2d 179.

Violence

(1) Ordinarily the employer should not be required to reinstate an employee who had been guilty of violence during a labor dispute.—Republic Steel Corp. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.3, 107 F.2d 472, certiorari denied 60 S.Ct. 806, 309 U.S. 684, 84 L.Ed. 1027, vacated on other grounds 60 S.Ct. 1072, 310 U.S. 655, 84 L.Ed. 1419, certiorari denied Central Council of Steel Plants, Northern Dist. Republic Steel Corp. v. N. L. R. B., 60 S.Ct. 808, 309 U.S. 684, 84 L.Ed. 1028, and supplemented, C.C.A., Republic Steel Corp. v. N. L. R. B., 114 F.2d 820, modified on other grounds 61 S.Ct. 77, 311 U.S. 7, 85 L.Ed. 6—Standard Lime & Stone Co. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.4, 97 F.2d 531—N. L. R. B. v. Ohio Calcium Co., C.C.A.6, 133 F.2d 721.

(2) Violence and lawless conduct occurring during strike did not require dismissal of entire proceeding before National Labor Relations Board involving reinstatement of striking employees.—Berkshire Knitting Mills & N. L. R. B., C.C.A.3, 139 F.2d 134, certiorari denied 64 S.Ct. 1158, 322 U.S. 747, 88 L.Ed. 1579.

(3) Norris-LaGuardia Act applies to reinstatement order of the board, and in absence of proof of actual participation, authorization, or ratification, an order requiring employer to reinstate strikers was not improper on theory that strikers were all responsible for acts of violence committed by some of their fellows.—Republic Steel Corp. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.3, 107 F.2d 472, certiorari denied 60 S.Ct. 806, 309 U.S. 684, 84 L. Ed. 1027, vacated on other grounds 60 S.Ct. 1072, 310 U.S. 655, 84 L.Ed. 1419, certiorari denied Central Council of Steel Plants, Northern Dist. Republic Steel Corp. v. N. L. R. B., 60 S.Ct. 808, 309 U.S. 684, 84 L.Ed. 1028, and supplemented, C.C.A., Republic Steel Corp. v. N. L. R. B., 114 F.2d 820, modified on other grounds 61 S.Ct. 77, 311 U.S. 7, 85 L.Ed. 6.

Conviction of crime

(1) Order of board requiring reinstatement of striking employees using punishment inflicted in local court as criterion of seriousness of offense was proper.—Berkshire Knitting Mills v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.3, 139 F.2d 134, certiorari denied 64 S.Ct. 1158, 322 U.S. 747, 88 L.Ed. 1579.

(2) The board could order reinstatement and back pay for striking employees who were convicted in military courts of rioting or were indicted for crime in other courts, where employers did not raise the question and had no rule or policy against employment of such persons.—Eagle-Picher Mining & Smelting Co. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.8, 119 F.2d 903.

(3) Finding that rioting was not of sufficient gravity to warrant exclusion from order of reinstatement was not an abuse of discretion.—N. L. R. B. v. Elkland Leather Co., C.C. A.3, 114 F.2d 221, certiorari denied Elkland Leather Co. v. N. L. R. B., 61 S.Ct. 170, 311 U.S. 705, 85 L.Ed. 457.

(4) Where employee was discharged because of union activities, board could order reinstatement despite a conviction of employee for malicious destruction of property, which employee testified was a consequence of his having become intoxicated and which was not a reason for the employee's discharge.—N. L. R. B. v. Oregon Worsted Co., C.C.A.9, 96 F. 2d 193.

93. U.S.—N. L. R. B. v. U. S. Truck Co., C.C.A.6, 124 F.2d 887.

Reinstatement will not be ordered where the employer has made a proper offer of reëmployment which was refused,[94] but an illegally conditioned offer of reëmployment will not bar a reinstatement order.[95] Reinstatement should not be ordered as to an employee who testifies that he does not desire reinstatement.[96]

c. Amount of Back-Pay Award

The back-pay award may not exceed the amount that the employee would have earned but for the unlawful discharge, and deductions should be made for compensation from other employment and for losses from the failure to seek or accept other employment.

The National Labor Relations Board has the power to determine the amount of back pay that the employer shall pay the employee,[97] but should give the employer a fair hearing on the question.[98] The order directing back pay need not determine the amount of the back-pay award; it may prescribe the rule to be applied and leave the actual computation to the parties.[99]

The board has reasonable discretion in determining the amount of the back-pay awards,[1] and, where the circumstances make it impractical to make an exact determination of each employee's back pay, the board may use as close approximations as the circumstances permit in determining back-pay awards.[2] Where the discrimination consisted in the fact that an undue proportion of union men were laid off during a slack period, an order directing back pay for such excess number and dividing it among all the union men laid off has been upheld.[3]

The provision for payment of back wages must be confined to restitution for the wrong done[4] and may not exceed the amount that the employee would have earned while at work but for the unlawful discharge.[5] Thus back pay may not be awarded for slack periods during which the employee would have been laid off[6] under the governing seniority system,[7] but men who ordinarily would have been transferred to other work during slack periods are entitled to back pay for such periods.[8] The period during which the employer's plant was closed down by a strike caused by his unfair labor practices need not be deducted in computing the back-pay award to one illegally discharged.[9] Back pay may not be awarded for the period during which the employee was serving in the armed forces.[10]

Reinstatement before negotiations as to back pay

An employer may not delay compliance with the reinstatement provisions of the order until the back-pay negotiations are concluded; reinstatement should precede the negotiations.—N. L. R. B. v. Seniority rules

Where discriminatorily discharged employee had seniority over some employees retained, seniority based on length of service within the particular class of employment was the proper test only if work denied discharged employee was within the scope of his particular class, but, if it was of a kind not restricted to his class, seniority should be determined on basis of time of entry into company's employ.—N. 10. U.S.—N. L. R. B. v. Walt Disney Productions, C.C.A.9, 146 F.2d 44, certiorari denied 65 S.Ct. 1025, 324

The period for which back pay may be awarded terminates on reinstatement,[11] but an employer's discriminatory offer of reëmployment does not terminate the period for which back pay may be awarded.[12] In the case of employees on strike, back pay should be limited to the period after application for reëmployment was made.[13]

In computing back-pay allowances, deductions should be made for compensation received from other employment.[14] Where the board limits its back-pay order to certain periods, earnings of the employee made outside the periods may not be deducted.[15] In the case of an employee who has obtained other employment at higher wages, the board may order the payment of back wages from the time of discharge to the time the new employment was obtained without deducting the subsequent excess from such sum.[16]

In computing the back-pay allowance, deductions should be made for losses which the employee willfully incurred, as where he failed to seek or refused to accept other employment,[17] but the strict rule of mitigation of damages applicable in civil

Change in pay

Where seamen had been reinstated to former positions without discrimination, and changes in their pay were not due to discriminations, such seamen were entitled to be made whole only for time between their respective discharges and offers of reinstatement.—Waterman S. S. Corporation v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.5, 119 F.2d 760.

Deduction of time during which employed

A back-pay order is not complied with by paying an amount computed by paying full wages for the period the employee was unemployed, instead of full wages for the total period less the amount of wages earned during that period.—Waterman S. S. Corporation v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A. 5, 119 F.2d 760.

Failure to raise issue

Affirmative defense

Showing as basis for deductions from back pay because of clearly unjustifiable refusal of discharged employee to take desirable new employment is an affirmative defense, and is not a part of board's case so as to require voiding of reinstatement order for failure to introduce evidence and make finding on the question.—N. L. R. B. v. J. G. Boswell Co., C.C.A.9, 136 F.2d 585.

suits by discharged employees is not applicable[18] and the board has a wide discretion in determining such deduction.[19]

Collateral benefits. The amount of the back-pay award should not be affected by collateral benefits and gifts received by the employee as a result of the discharge.[20] Unemployment insurance payments received by the employee need not be deducted in computing his back pay,[21] and are not "earnings" within the meaning of an order of the board directing the payment of back wages less the employee's net earnings.[22]

Delay in proceeding. Delay by the board in entering the order[23] or in filing the complaint[24] does not require the shortening of the period for which the employee is entitled to back pay, but the back-pay award should not cover the period prior to the filing of charges, where the filing of charges was unreasonably delayed.[25]

Payment to government work relief agencies. A back-pay order providing that, in computing the amount, receipts by the employee from work relief agencies be deducted and that the employer pay such sums to the government agencies involved is invalid in so far as it directs payment to the government agencies.[26]

§ 28(120). Actions For Breach of Contract

In an action by an employee against his employer for damages arising from the employer's breach of a contract between the employer and the employee's bargaining representative, the general rules as to trial in civil actions apply.

General rules as to trial and judgment apply to actions by an employee against his employer for breach of his rights under a contract between the employer and the employee's organization.[27] The union's interpretation of its contract with the employer should be recognized in determining an employee's rights under such contract.[28] Where the contract provides a method for determining whether a discharge is wrongful and the parties resort to such procedure and a determination is made, the wrongfulness of the discharge may not be determined de novo in an action for damages because of the discharge.[29] The court may not adjudicate rights against one not party to the proceeding.[30]

Disputed questions of fact, such as whether a discharge was wrongful, should be submitted to the jury[31] under proper instructions.[32] A verdict for defendant should not be directed where plaintiff has established a prima facie case,[33] but the court in awarding judgment may disregard the finding of the jury as to an immaterial fact.[34]

Damages. An employee has been held to be entitled to recover the damage caused to him by the breach of contract.[35] The measure of damages for breach of an employment contract is the amount the

To time of trial

The damages recoverable by an unjustly discharged employee are limited to the amount accrued at the time of the trial.—Galveston, H. & S. A. Ry. Co. v. Eubanks, Tex.Civ. App., 42 S.W.2d 475, affirmed Eubanks v. Galveston, H. & S. A. Ry. Co., Com.App., 59 S.W.2d 825.

Vacation pay

It has been held that, under a contract providing for severance pay on discharge, the employee is not entitled to accrued vacation pay in employee would have received as wages had the contract been performed, less the amount he has earned during the period,[36] and it has been held that damages for loss of seniority and for being blacklisted and boycotted by other employers are too remote to be recoverable.[37] The employee may not recover for the loss of rights not contemplated when the contract was made, such as the right to group insurance, where such insurance was issued after the contract was made.[38] The duty of a wrongfully discharged employee to mitigate damages by exercising reasonable diligence to obtain other employment has been held to be confined to a search for other work of substantially the same position, status, capacity, or grade, or, failing to secure such, other employment for which he is fitted.[39]

§ 28(121). Arbitration Proceedings

The general rules as to arbitration proceedings apply as to the hearing, determination, and award in the arbitration of a labor dispute or a controversy between employers and employees.

The general rules, discussed in Arbitration and Award § 1 et seq, apply as to the hearing, determination, and award in the arbitration of a labor dispute or a controversy between employers and em ployees.[40] Accordingly a valid arbitration award is binding and conclusive on the parties.[41] The award must be final and definite and an arbitrators' award of back pay, without specifying the amount, is ineffective.[42] The award must be within the scope of the submission,[43] but one who acquiesced in enlarging the scope of the proceedings may not raise the point.[44] The fact that the award ex-

Earnings of one having next seniority

In switchman's action against railroad for damages for wrongful discharge contrary to contract between railroad and trainmen's union, the earnings of man next below switchman on seniority roster did not measure his damages where switchman was not a regular worker before his discharge, and hence it was proper to consider that in estimating his losses due to discharge.—Illinois Cent. Conditions precedent

Provision in contract that disputes should be decided by board subject to right of final review by state director whose decision should be binding on all parties, would not make decision of state director final and binding on any of the parties unless a dispute had been first decided by the board and decision of the director was then made on review of board's decision.—Allen v. Reinstatement award

Under arbitration provision that, whenever any grievance had not been settled satisfactorily such grievance could be submitted to impartial umpire for determination, the umpire was not limited to a determination as to whether discharge of certain employees was wrongful, but he had power to direct reinstatement of such employees with or without back pay, and his determination was final.—Atlantic Basin Iron Works v. Industrial Union of Marine & Shipbuilding Workers of America CIO Local 39, 59 N.Y.S.2d 662.

Specific performance

Where employment contract contained provision for the arbitration of any dispute of any nature that might arise, in arbitrating a dispute arbitrator was not limited to an award of money judgment as against contention that arbitrators could not properly award relief in the nature of a decree of specific performance.—Freydberg Bros. v. Corey, 31 N.Y.S. 2d 10, 177 Misc. 560, affirmed 32 N.Y.S.2d 129, 263 App.Div. 805, reargument denied 32 N.Y.S.2d 783, 263 App.Div. 858.

ceeds the scope of the submission does not render the entire award invalid; only that part of the award which is improper is invalid.[45] An award is ineffective where it is incomplete and fails to determine essential issues.[46]

Under statutes establishing administrative agencies to conciliate, arbitrate, and determine differences, and discriminations affecting employers, employees, and their organizations, it is generally required that the agency afford all parties a full and fair hearing before making its determination.[47] Where such agency acts as a quasi-judicial tribunal it may not consider as evidence facts which were not introduced as such.[48] An award which fails to decide all the material questions submitted is invalid;[49] thus, where interdependent questions as to wage rate and work load are submitted, an award as to wage rate without a determination of work load is invalid.[50] Where the parties have joined in the submission of the controversy, the award is binding on them,[51] but the award is not binding on one who refused to submit the controversy to the board,[52] and one who participated in the proceedings, but reserved the right to attack the award if it went beyond certain matters, is not estopped to do so.[53]

Railway Labor Act. Under the Railway Labor Act, 45 U.S.C.A. § 151 et seq, an award by the National Railroad Adjustment Board is not effective against an aggrieved employee unless he is represented individually in the proceedings, and the mere fact that the collective representative of the employees appeared and purported to act for him is insufficient.[54] However, an award by the board is entitled to presumptive weight in determining whether the employee was represented in the proceedings[55] and the burden of proof is on the one claiming to the contrary;[56] it will not be presumed that the union or the board disregarded the employee's right to participate in the proceedings.[57] Moreover, an employee who has knowledge of the proceeding and that the union is purporting to act for him may not stand by and assert his rights for the first time after a decision has been reached.[58]

It has been held that a dispute once submitted to, and heard by, the National Railroad Adjustment Board may not be withdrawn.[59] If any member of the board is directly interested in the result, his decision should not be considered on the final award,[60] but if no such interest appears, and the award is unanimous, the fact that one of the members is disqualified will not affect the validity of the award.[61] An award by the board must be final and definite and capable of enforcement[62] and should fix a time for compliance.[63] The awards of the board are not self-executing.[64]

An award of arbitrators acting under the Railway Labor Act must dispose of every substantial matter presented in the specific questions submitted to them;[65] an award which is incomplete is invalid unless it is accepted by the parties.[66] It has been held that an award signed by a majority of the arbitrators is valid, notwithstanding the refusal of the minority to participate further after the filing of a report stating the inability of the arbitrators to agree.[67] An award made and filed after the date specified in the submission is a nullity[68] unless the parties have agreed to an extension of time.[69] It has been held that the arbitration of the question whether the notice of starting time should be changed from forty-eight to twelve hours gave the arbitrators power to fix a time anywhere within those figures.[70]

An arbitration award under the Railway Labor Act is binding on the parties.[71] An award by the Railroad Adjustment Board is not a mere advisory opinion, but is legally binding on the parties,[72] and

Hours of labor

A ruling of an arbitration board, to which a controversy between carriers and a union had been submitted, that changed exceptions to a modified rule regulating the hours of labor would not apply to positions then on an eight-hour basis, although reserved until the evidence was all in, was merely a ruling on the evidence, separate from the decision and award of the board, and did not prevent a change of rule as to working time and of exceptions thereto, except then existing exceptions relating to eight-hour watches, and the board had jurisdiction to consider evidence introduced by the carriers with respect to exceptions.—Atchison, T. & S. this is also true as to an award by arbitrators acting under the Railway Labor Act.[73]

Under the Railway Labor Act, 45 U.S.C.A. § 155 first (b), if arbitration at the request of the mediation board shall be refused by one or both of the parties, the board shall at once notify both parties in writing that its mediatory efforts have failed and for thirty days thereafter, unless in the intervening period the parties agree to arbitration, or an emergency board be created, no change shall be made in the rates of pay, rules, or working conditions or established practices in effect prior to the time the dispute arose.[74]

Transportation Act. An award of the Railroad Labor Board under the Transportation Act of 1920, 45 U.S.C.A. § 131 et seq, was advisory only, with no coercive effect whatsoever other than the sanction and force of publicity and public opinion,[75] but such award was binding where the parties made a prior agreement to submit the controversy to the board and abide by its decision[76] or where they accepted or ratified the award.[77] Although an agreement between a railroad company and its employees as to wages, as modified by the board, having been accepted and followed by the company, creates an implied contract to pay its employees accordingly, where there is no agreement to continue such payments for any specified time, and a reduction in wages has been accepted by the employee, there is no contract or legal obligation on the part of the company to pay the higher wages.[78]

6. Judicial Enforcement or Review of Orders or Awards

§ 28(122). In General

a. General principles
b. Under National Labor Relations Act
c. Under Railway Labor Act

a. General Principles

Judicial proceedings are necessary, under some state labor relations acts, in order to compel compliance with orders of the state labor relations board.

Under provisions of a state labor relations act similar to those of the National Labor Relations Act it has been held that the board cannot enforce its orders by its own direct action, but must petition the court to secure enforcement.[79] Until confirmed by the court the order of the board does not have final legal sanction[80] or give any vested right,[81] and where an order rendered by the board has not been

Engineers, under its agreement with colored firemen and under Railway Labor Act owed colored firemen same duty to protect their seniority rights as Brotherhood owed its own members, and Brotherhood presented to Nation Railroad Adjustment Board dispute with railroad as to seniority rights as firemen of demoted white engineers as a dispute solely between demoted engineers and railroad, wholly ignoring seniority rights of colored firemen, and railroad knew of contract establishing seniority rights for colored firemen and withheld such information from board, award of board giving demoted engineers seniority was not res judicata as to rights of colored firemen.—Griffin v. Gulf & S. I. R. Co., 21 So.2d 814, 198 Miss. 458.

An award is not a "conclusive legal determination" but its decisions are not without legal effect.—Washington Terminal Co. v. Boswell, 124 F.2d 235, 76 U.S.App.D.C. 1, affirmed 63 S.Ct. 1430, 319 U.S. 732, 87 L.Ed. 1694.

"Final and binding"

The provision of the act that awards of the board shall be "final and binding" by quoted words may make decisions of the board more efficacious than mere private advice, but do not invest them with the force of unappealable judicial decisions.—Dahlberg v. Pittsburgh & L. E. R. Co., C.C.A.Pa., 138 F.2d 121.

reviewed and confirmed by a court at the time that the labor relations statute is repealed, the order loses its vitality and the reviewing court loses any jurisdiction conferred on it by the statute over proceedings with relation to such an order.[82]

On the proper filing in court of the petition for enforcement and the record, and the giving of notice to the person charged with failure to obey the board's order, the court acquires jurisdiction of the proceeding.[83] Where the matter is already in court on an appeal or petition for review, there is no need for the board to file a new action or petition for enforcement of its order,[84] since the court, on such appeal, can do precisely what it could on a petition of the board seeking enforcement of its order.[85]

Arbitration. The enforcement of an arbitration award under a clause in a collective bargaining agreement ordinarily is not dependent on statute, but may be had under the common law.[86] However, where the review of a labor arbitration is sought under statutory provisions, the scope of the court's jurisdiction depends on the terms of the statute.[87]

b. Under National Labor Relations Act

Under the National Labor Relations Act judicial proceedings may be instituted to enforce or review an order of the National Labor Relations Board, and the court thereupon acquires exclusive jurisdiction of the cause.

Under National Labor Relations Act § 10 (e), 29 U.S.C.A. § 160 (e), an order of the National Labor Relations Board may be enforced by a court decree;[88] and under a further provision of the Act, § 10 (f), 29 U.S.C.A. § 160 (f), an order of the board may be reviewed by the court, at the instance of a person aggrieved thereby, with a view to having the order modified or set aside.[89] Application to the court is necessary in order to secure enforcement of an order of the board,[90] since the board itself has no power directly to enforce it;[91] and until the board's order has been affirmed by the appropriate court no penalty accrues for disobeying it.[92]

The aim of the stautory provisions is to attain simplicity and directness on judicial review[93] and to secure a just result with a minimum of technical requirements.[94] After jurisdiction of the court has attached in proceedings for the enforcement of an order of the National Labor Relations Board no separate proceeding is needed on the part of the person brought into court, who deems himself aggrieved by the order of the board, to obtain a review of the order of the board;[95] the breadth of the jurisdiction conferred on the court by the statutory provisions providing for the enforcement of the board's orders gives the party proceeded against the right to raise all pertinent questions and to obtain any affirmative relief that is appropriate.[96] Similarly, where the court entertains a petition of a person for a review of the board's order, the board can seek not merely to have the petition denied but to have its order enforced, regardless of any separate proceeding to that end.[97]

Acquisition and retention of jurisdiction. On the proper commencement of proceedings for enforcement or review of an order of the board by the filing of the necessary papers and the giving of notice, the court becomes vested with exclusive[98] jurisdiction[99] of the cause. In this connection three things are necessary to give the court jurisdiction, a petition, a transcript of the entire record, and notice to the respondent;[1] and the court has no jurisdiction and can take no step of any sort until all this has been done.[2] Until the court has thus acquired jurisdiction, the board has the right to vacate its order and proceed further in the matter,[3] and if it does so the court has no jurisdiction of the cause;[4] but, after jurisdiction has been acquired by the court, the board is without power to modify or set aside its findings and order[5] or to withdraw its petition at its pleasure.[6]

Nunc pro tunc filing of transcript

An order that a transcript should be deemed to have been filed nunc pro tunc as of the date when the petition was filed is a nullity as far as acquisition of jurisdiction by the court is concerned, since jurisdiction cannot be antedated by fictions contrary to the express provisions of the statute.—N. Discretion of court

The grant or refusal of permission to withdraw a petition, after the court has acquired jurisdiction of

tions Board are statutory;[7] but they are judicial proceedings rather than administrative or quasi-judicial as were the proceedings before the board.[8] The jurisdiction of the court on a petition to enforce or review an order of the board is of an appellate court review character,[9] and the proceedings have been described as a combination of an appeal from the order and a motion to enforce it.[10] It has been said that proceedings for a review of an order of the board are substantially proceedings in equity in that equitable rules are applicable.[11]

Discovery, interrogatories, depositions, and subpœnas. The court has power to permit an employer to file interrogatories to be propounded to the board,[12] and also to permit the taking of depositions of named witnesses who are alleged to know how the case was handled by the board and how its decision was reached.[13] However, the court in the exercise of its discretion will not order a bill of discovery, permit the taking of depositions, or require the answering of interrogatories where sufficient grounds therefor are not shown.[14] It will not, for example, permit interrogatories as to matters which are irrelevant and immaterial.[15] In determining whether allegations made by the employer are such as to require an answer to the interrogatories submitted by it in support of its application, the court may look at the proceeding from the time of its inception.[16]

It has been held proper, in proceedings for the enforcement of an order of the National Labor Relations Board, for a special master first to examine documents subpœnaed by him and to determine their materiality with respect to issues presented by the case before any of the documents are exhibited or submitted to counsel for the respective parties.[17]

c. Under Railway Labor Act

An award of the National Railroad Adjustment Board made pursuant to the federal Railway Labor Act may be enforced in a suit brought by the employee for that purpose, provided the conditions precedent to such an action have been met.

Under the federal Railway Labor Act an award of the National Railroad Adjustment Board may be enforced by means of a suit,[18] and the aid of the courts by means of an enforcement suit is necessary

Unknown to common law

Public interest

An enforcement proceeding is in the public interest, prosecuted by an authorized agency of the government, in furtherance of an express policy and intent on the part of congress to establish, in behalf of the national public, a standard of conduct presumably productive of progress in protection of the public welfare.—Aluminum Ore Co. v. Holdings under earlier statutes

(1) The decisions of the labor board created under the Transportation Act of 1920 were not enforceable by process.—Pennsylvania R. Co. v. U. S. Railroad Labor Bd., 43 S. Ct. 278, 261 U.S. 72, 79, 67 L.Ed. 536 —39 C.J. p 69 note 27.

(2) It was not for any court to pass on the correctness of the board's conclusions if it kept within the jurisdiction assigned to it by the

to compel the carrier to obey the award.[19] Such a suit brought by the person for whose benefit the order of the board was made is the only judicial review of orders of the board which is provided by the Railway Labor Act,[20] and it has been held that the statute impliedly makes the enforcement suit exclusive of others to determine rights arising under collective agreements as to a carrier and employees who have utilized the adjustment procedure and procured an award.[21]

Proceedings to compel a carrier to comply with an order of the National Railroad Adjustment Board, since they are purely statutory, must comply with the statutory provisions.[22] In such a suit the Railway Labor Act gives the employee definite and substantial advantages,[23] such as choice of venue, exemption from payment of costs, and recovery of attorney's fees if successful,[24] and the purpose and effect of such advantages are to equalize the burden, financial and otherwise, of extended litigation as between employees and the carriers.[25]

Nature of action as contractual. It has been held that an action to enforce an award of the National Railroad Adjustment Board is comparable to an action brought for a breach of contract,[26] and that the legal rights of plaintiff in such an action must be determined in accordance with the law of contracts;[27] but it has also been held that such an action is of statutory origin on a basis quite different from that of an ordinary law action for breach of contract.[28]

Conditions precedent to action. Enforcement proceedings against a carrier under the Railway Labor Act are not authorized unless the National Railroad Adjustment Board has made an award and order against the carrier,[29] and the carrier has failed or refused to comply therewith,[30] within the time limit set therein.[31] The court cannot require the carrier to comply with an order of the board where the order fails to fix a time limit within which the order should be complied with,[32] and the court is without authority to choose some optional date at which a compliance shall be had.[33]

§ 28(123). Decisions Reviewable

As a rule only final orders of a labor relations board are subject to direct judicial review under federal and state labor relations acts.

In general, under the provisions of the federal[35] and state[36] labor relations acts, the courts have power to review proceedings of a labor relations board only where the board has rendered a final order. Ordinarily no judicial review of interlocutory determinations of the board is available;[37] the sole remedy for a review of such determination is in the course of an appeal from a final order of the board.[38]

§ 28(124). —— Orders Entered in Representation Proceedings

a. Under federal statutes
b. Under state statutes

a. Under Federal Statutes

Orders of the National Labor Relations Board fixing a bargaining unit, directing that an election be held, or certifying a bargaining agent, are not subject to direct judicial review, and can be reviewed only where the board has made a final determination of unfair labor practice based thereon. The certification of a bargaining representative by the National Mediation Board is not subject to judicial review.

Under the National Labor Relations Act the court cannot review representation proceedings unless the National Labor Relations Board, following such proceedings, has made a final order under the statutory provisions dealing with unfair labor practices, and such final order is based in whole or in part on facts certified in the representation proceedings.[39] Thus a ruling of the board determining an appropriate bargaining unit, but not making any final order based thereon, is not subject to direct review under the statute,[40] although such ruling can be challenged when a determination of unfair practices is based on that ruling.[41] Similarly a direction of the board that an election be held is but a part of the representation proceeding and is not subject to direct review,[42] and a court review of an election or order therefor is available when, but only when, the board, subsequent to the election, has made a final order requiring the employer to do something predicated on the result of the election.[43] Likewise the certification of a bargaining representative is not itself a final order based on facts certified in the representation proceedings so as to be subject to direct judicial review;[44] here too judicial review of the board's certification may be had when, but only when, the board finds unfair labor practices and makes its certification the basis of an order with respect to such practices.[45]

Under the Railway Labor Act the federal courts have no power to review the action of the National Mediation Board in certifying a particular labor organization as the bargaining representative of employees of a carrier.[46]

b. Under State Statutes

Under state labor relations acts containing provisions similar to those of the federal act, determinations of a state labor relations board in representation proceedings are not directly reviewable and may be considered by the court only in connection with its review of a final order dealing with unfair labor practices.

review by the courts. Such a determination is interlocutory and may be reviewed only in connection with the review of a final order which is made under the provisions relating to the prevention of unfair labor practices[49] and which is necessarily affected by the interlocutory determination.[50] However, where the board does make an order on the question of unfair practices directing the employer to take or to refrain from taking some action, and such order of the board is properly taken before a court for review, that court may then review the propriety of the board's action in the representation proceedings.[51]

§ 28(125). Limitations and Laches

Enforcement proceedings should be instituted promptly; but in the absence of statutory limitation mere delay in seeking enforcement of an order of a labor relations board is not fatal.

While enforcement proceedings should be instituted promptly,[52] there is no period of limitation set forth in the National Labor Relations Act within which such proceedings must be brought.[53] Hence, enforcement of an order of the National Labor Relations Board ordinarily will not be denied because of delay in bringing the enforcement proceedings[54] notwithstanding the delay may be unusual,[55] since if the employer is aggrieved by the delay he has a remedy by bringing a petition for review;[56] and under state statutes similar to the National Labor Relations Act it has also been held that mere delay in applying to the court for enforcement of an order of the state labor relations board is not a ground for refusing an enforcement decree.[57]

Enforcement will not be denied on the ground of long delay of the board in concluding the case where laches is not in fact shown.[58] The fact that

Fifteen months

Board's delay of some fifteen months in making a decision after delay has ensued between the date of an election at which a bargaining agent for the employees was chosen and the date of certification of such agent by the board has been held not a basis for refusing to enforce the order of the board.[59]

Under the Railway Labor Act § 3 (q), 45 U.S.C.A. § 153 (q), statutory suits for the enforcement of an award of the National Railway Adjustment Board must be commenced within two years from the time the cause of action accrues.[60] The intent of the statute is to cut off the statutory right at once on the termination of the stated period,[61] and the statutory limitation must be construed in an endeavor to effectuate its purpose and intent.[62] In determining whether the period of limitations has run, the underlying facts set forth in the complaint,[63] rather than some erroneous theory of law or legal conclusion asserted by plaintiff,[64] must control.

§ 28(126). Parties

a. In general
b. Under National Labor Relations Act

a. In General

In general an order of a labor relations board may be enforced at the instance of the board or reviewed at the instance of a person aggrieved. An action under the federal Railway Labor Act may be maintained only by the person for whose benefit the order was made.

The general rules governing the joinder of necessary parties in other civil proceedings have been applied in proceedings brought under labor relations statutes to review orders of a board.[65] Under state labor relations acts similar to the National Labor Relations Act it has been held that the state labor relations board is not only a proper party to proceedings to enforce its order,[66] but is the only party authorized to institute such proceedings.[67] On the other hand, under state statutes similar to the federal act, a "person aggrieved" by a decision of the board,[68] such as the employer,[69] may in a proper case seek a review of the board's decision with a view to having it modified or set aside. However, it has been held that the board itself is not a "person aggrieved" by its own orders and has no right to be heard or represented in court on an appeal from its decision.[70]

benefit an order of the Railroad Adjustment Board has been made may maintain the statutory action provided for in the Railway Labor Act.[71] Such an action may be maintained, in a proper case, by individual employees[72] or by labor organizations.[73]

b. Under National Labor Relations Act

The National Labor Relations Board alone has the right to institute enforcement proceedings under the National Labor Relations Act; but the right to institute proceedings to modify or set aside an order of the board extends to any "person aggrieved" by the order.

Enforcement proceedings are in the public interest, and private parties have no rightful place therein except as the court may desire to avail itself of helpful suggestions.[74] The National Labor Relations Act gives no authority for any proceeding by a private person or group, or by any employee or group of employees, to secure enforcement of the Board's order under § 10 (e) of the Act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 160 (e);[75] the board,[76] and the board alone,[77] may institute the enforcement proceedings. A private person aggrieved by a final order of the board, however, has the right under National Labor Relations Act § 10 (f), 29 U.S.C.A. § 160 (f), to review or contest the order with a view to having it modified or set aside;[78] and an employee[79] or a labor union acting as representative of employees[80] may be a person so aggrieved.

The presence of an employees' association is not a prerequisite to enforcement of an order directing the employer to cease and desist from dominating such association or interfering with the employees' right to self organization.[81]

§ 28(127). Pleadings and Briefs

a. In general
b. Answer or cross petition

a. In General

The pleadings in proceedings to enforce orders of labor relations or railroad adjustment boards should state facts sufficient to justify the relief sought; but compliance with common-law formalities of pleading is not always essential. Briefs may properly be filed.

The National Labor Relations Act does not require common-law formality in pleading,[82] and under some circumstances the court may treat a brief

A petition for enforcement must contain allegations sufficient to justify the relief sought.[88]

Railway Labor Act. The complaint in an action to enforce an order of the National Railroad Adjustment Board must state the causes for which relief is claimed[89] and will be construed in accordance with the usual rules governing the construction of pleadings.[90]

b. Answer or Cross Petition

It is better practice for a respondent to file an answer to a petition for the enforcement of an order of the National Labor Relations Board. Under some state statutes, the state labor relations board cannot file an answer to a petition for review, although it can file a cross petition for enforcement.

Although the provisions of the National Labor Relations Act and the rules of court make no mention of a respondent's answer to a petition for enforcement of an order of the National Labor Relations Board,[91] and although the court will not order an answer where no point is made touching the absence of one,[92] nevertheless the filing of an answer has been considered to be desirable in order that the grounds of opposition may be shown, the issues defined, and undisputed matters more readily eliminated from consideration.[93] The allegations of the answer should be allegations of fact, not conclusions of law,[94] although the absence of sufficient denials in the answer does not always preclude the court from considering the merits of the case.[95]

Under the provisions of some state labor relations acts, the labor relations board has no standing to file an answer to a petition for a review of its order.[96] It can, however, file a counter petition or cross petition for enforcement which the

85. Findings held properly considered
Where evidence and findings were quite similar as to several plants operated by the employer, the action of the board in considering the findings for each of the plants together in brief was not improper.—Reliance Mfg. Co. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.7, 125 F.2d 311.

86. Outcome immaterial to party filing brief
Where the brief of a union asked that the order of the board be set aside, but on oral argument before the court the union stated that it was immaterial to such union whether the court enforced or set aside the order, it was held that the court could disregard the brief of the union.—N. L. R. B. v. Pacific Gas & Electric Co., C.C.A.9, 118 F.2d 780.

87. Surplusage
That part of a brief which presented evidence contrary to that supporting the findings, and in which the court was asked to pass on the credibility of witnesses and the weight of their testimony, was held unnecessary and surplusage.—N. L. R. B. v. J. G. Boswell Co., C.C.A.9, 136 F.2d 585.

A petition was construed as alleging that railroad agreed with plaintiff that provisions of bargaining agreement should be applicable to plaintiff, notwithstanding provisions in agreement to contrary.—Cleapor v. Atlanta, B. & C. R. Co., C.C.A.Ga., 123 F.2d 374.

Issues argued orally and in briefs
In the absence of an answer to the petition of the board, it will be assumed that the respondent raises only those issues argued in its briefs and orally before the court.—N. L. R. B. v. Griswold Mfg. Co., C.C.A.3, 106 F.2d 713.

Answer deemed amended
Although the answer set forth no legal ground why the order of the board should not be enforced, nevertheless where the case was fully argued on the merits, both in the briefs and at the hearing, and the board did not urge the absence of denials in the answer, the court considered the merits, on the theory that the answer might be deemed amended to raise the argued issues.—N. court may treat as an original petition for enforcement.[97]

§ 28(128). Record

The record in the proceedings before the labor relations board should be filed in court as a basis for judicial proceedings with respect to the board's order, and permission to supplement or correct the record must be based on a showing of sufficient grounds.

The National Labor Relations Act requires the certification, and the filing in the court, of a transcript of the entire record in the proceeding, including the pleadings and testimony on which such order was entered and the findings and order of the board.[98] It has been held that the evidence must be presented in the record in question and answer form[99] and that it is not sufficient to set out the evidence in narrative form.[1]

Correcting or supplementing record. The court will deny an application to supplement[2] or correct[3] the record where sufficient grounds therefor are not shown, as where the facts sought to be incorporated in a supplemental record pertain to an issue which the court may not properly consider.[4] A motion to compel a labor relations board to certify up a certain document for consideration may properly be denied where it is not made until after the court has entered judgment.[5]

Cost; proceedings in forma pauperis. The circuit court of appeals cannot require the National Labor Relations Board to deliver a certified copy of the transcript of the record without prepayment of costs;[6] and the court, even if willing to permit proceedings for review in forma pauperis, may do so only in so far as the costs of the circuit court of appeals are concerned.[7]

a. In general
b. Under National Labor Relations Act
c. Under Railway Labor Act
d. Under state statutes

a. In General

The courts should not interfere with the award of an arbitrator in a labor dispute except for substantial reasons, such as fraud, corruption, or misconduct.

The court is not justified in interfering with the award rendered by an arbitrator in a labor dispute unless substantial reason exists for so doing,[8] and, in general, the award should not be disturbed in the Record of previous proceedings only

Provision requiring the board, when petitioning for enforcement of its order, to certify and file a transcript of the record in the proceedings, refers to the record of previous proceedings and not proceedings subsequent to the hearing before, and decision of, the board, even though they arise between the same parties.—N. L. R. B. v. West Kentucky Coal Co., C.C.A.6, 152 F.2d 198, certiorari denied 66 S.Ct. 1372, 328 U.S. 866, 90 L.Ed. 1636.

Defect not cured by record supporting counter-petition
Failure to present the evidence in question and answer form on an application for a review of the board's order has been held fatal to the jurisdiction of the court to grant such application, even where a counter-petition is presented by the board for enforcement supported by a record certified by the board and setting out the evidence in question and answer form.—Foote Bros. Transcript of hearing before congressional committee

Evidence concerning election
Petitioners seeking to review and set aside cease and desist order of National Labor Relations Board were not entitled to have court consider their motion to include additional evidence in the record concerning an election, since petitioners' remedy was to apply to court for an order requiring board to receive and consider such additional evidence and to file its recommendations for modification or setting aside of its original order.—Wilson & Co. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.10, 156 F.2d 577, certiorari denied 67 S.Ct. 357, 329 U.S. 789, 91 L.Ed. 676.

8. N.Y.—Goldberg v. Rialto Retailers, 43 N.Y.S.2d 432.

Grounds held not established
(1) Arbitrator's willful disregard of well-established legal principles and deliberate misstatements with respect to the evidence.—In re E. A. Laboratories, 50 N.Y.S.2d 222.

(2) Arbitrator's refusal to hear evidence pertinent and material to the controversy.—Goldberg v. Rialto Retailers, 43 N.Y.S.2d 432.

absence of fraud, corruption, or misconduct.[9] Such award should not be set aside for mere errors of judgment either as to the law or the facts[10] or for a mere departure from formal technicalities not resulting in injury.[11]

Propriety of submission. Where a labor dispute has been submitted to arbitration by the employer and a union claiming to represent a majority of the employees, and thereafter a group of employees also claiming to constitute a majority attacks the arbitrator's award and asserts that the union was not authorized to act for them, it has been held that the court has power to determine whether the arbitration submission and award were proper;[12] and the court has also been held to have power to determine all questions of fact preliminary to that determination,[13] such as whether or not the union in fact represented a majority of the employees.[14]

b. Under National Labor Relations Act

(a) In general
(b) Due process and fair trial
(c) Harmless error

(a) In General

As a general rule a court reviewing an order of the National Labor Relations Board may examine questions of jurisdiction, regularity of procedure, and constitutional right or statutory authority; but the court should confine its review to questions of law and may not probe the mental processes of the board.

In proceedings under the National Labor Relations Act for the enforcement or review of an order of the National Labor Relations Board, all questions of the jurisdiction of the board[15] and the regularity of its proceedings,[16] and all questions of constitutional right or statutory authority,[17] are open to examination by the court. The court may

Time of filing award

The fact that an award of appraisers was not filed before the date specified for such filing in the agreement of the parties was held not a ground for refusing to enforce the award where there was no provision in the agreement making time of the essence, or showing that the time element was of practical consequence, and rigorous enforcement of the time condition of the contract would in effect impose a heavy and unreasonable forfeiture.—Hegeberg v. Prevention of illegal act

If employees attacking the arbitration award do in fact represent a majority of the employees, a contract forcing their membership in a particular union is illegal; and on that ground alone, and completely apart from any question of jurisdiction under the arbitration law, the court in the exercise of its general equitable power to prevent the commission of an illegal act has full power to set aside a closed-shop provision of the arbitration award.—Busch Jewelry Co. v. Winters, D.C. N.Y., 23 F.Supp. 776.

Service of order

Petitions for enforcement of board's orders are premature unless filed after orders were served on respondent, and, if jurisdiction depends on filing of petitions alone, lack of certainty whether petitions were filed after orders were served would be fatal.—N. L. R. B. v. Friedman-Harry Marks Clothing Co., C.C. A.2, 83 F.2d 731.

17. U.S.—N. L. R. B. v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corporation, 57 S. Ct. 615, 301 U.S. 1, 81 L.Ed. 893, 108 A.L.R. 1352—Cupples Co. Manufacturers v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A., 103 F.2d 953—N. L. R. B. v. Scope of order

Courts which are called on to enforce board orders by their own decrees may examine the scope of the orders to see whether they go so beyond the authority of the board so as to require modification as a matter of law before enforcement.—May Dept. Stores Co. v. N. L. R. B., 66 S.Ct. 203, 326 U.S. 376, 90 L.Ed. 145, rehearing denied 66 S.Ct. 468, 326 U.S. 811, 90 L.Ed. 495.

Source of order

The court may inquire as to the source of an order purporting to come from the National Labor Relations Board where the record discloses no evidence that it did, and the circumstances indicate that it did not.—N. L. R. B. v. Lane Cotton Mills Co., C.C.A.5, 108 F.2d 568.

consider the question whether or not the board proceeded lawfully in making up the findings of fact,[18] and may examine the findings of the board to determine whether they afford any legal basis for the board's order.[19] The court is not, however, a general court of errors for the National Labor Relations Board[20] and its supervisory power or control over orders of the board is limited;[21] its review must rest within the statutory power granted to it under the provisions of the National Labor Relations Act.[22]

In general the only function of the court in proceedings to enforce or review such an order is to determine whether the board, acting within the compass of its power, has held a proper hearing, has made findings based on substantial evidence, and has ordered an appropriate remedy;[23] and, if the findings are supported or unchallenged, the only

Ambiguity or inconsistency in findings

It is within the power of the court to determine whether or not there is any ambiguity or inconsistency in the findings of the board.—Jacksonville Paper Co. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A., 137 F.2d 148, certiorari denied 64 S.Ct. 84, 320 U.S. 772, 88 L.Ed. 462.

Adoption of findings without consideration of evidence

Where petition for enforcement stated that board considered the case and on all testimony and evidence made its findings of fact and issued its order, and answer alleged that board did not consider evidence but referred it to others for suggested findings of facts and that, with no opportunity to know of or criticize suggestions, they were adopted by board without further inquiry, court had jurisdiction to decide the issue. —N. Ruling of examiner on continuances

In proceeding on charges of unfair labor practices, the matter of continuances rests in trial examiner's sound discretion, and his ruling ordinarily is not reviewable.—Jefferson Electric Co. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.7, 102 F.2d 949.

Production of election records

Trial examiner's refusal to have election records produced need not be considered by reviewing court when the election was not involved. —N. L. R. B. v. Pacific Gas & Electric Co., C.C.A.9, 118 F.2d 780.

Refusal to bargain

In proceedings for the review and enforcement of an order requiring the employer to bargain with a union, where it appears that the employees undertook a strike in breach of covenant not to do so, the court cannot compel employees to work, or restrain them in exercise of lawful activities normally incident to prosecution of strike, but has the sole problem to determine whether there was a refusal to bargain in view of the terms of the contract and in the light of undisputed facts. —Timken Roller Bearing Co. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.6, 161 F.2d 949.

Conflict with state law

An order requiring insurance company to reinstate discharged agent could not be refused enforcement on ground that enforcement would conflict with state statute relating to notice to state superintendent of insurance of appointment of agent, where order did not curtail company's obligation to state the truth when it applied to state superintendent for renewal of any agent's license, and, if company should be unable to comply with order because of agent's failure to obtain a renewal of his license, company might then petition the court for amendment of enforcement decree.—N. L. R. B. v. Monumental Life Ins. Co., C.C.A.6, 162 F.2d 340.

Proviso attached to board's current appropriation was held not to preclude the board from asking enforcement of its order by the court, since a limitation on spending by the board may not be construed as a limitation on the jurisdiction of the court to enforce a board order.—N. L. R. B. v. Thompson Products, C.C.A.9, 141 F.2d 794—N. L. R. B. v. Baltimore Transit Co., C.C.A.4, 140 F.2d 51, certiorari denied Baltimore Transit Co. v. N. L. R. question for consideration is the kind of order, based on such findings, which the board had power to make.[24] Ordinarily only questions of law are open for the consideration of the court;[25] but, conversely, a decision of the board on a question of law is not conclusive on the court.[26]

Rulings which individually would not invalidate an order of the board do not in combination acquire the necessary strength to do so, at least where such rulings in their combination do not amount to unfairness.[27] Circumstances which might be sufficient courtroom disturbance to be grounds for a mistrial in a jury case do not necessarily constitute a basis for setting aside an order of the board based on the record.[28]

Mental processes; motive or intent. The court will not probe the mental process of the board in reaching its conclusions,[29] nor, when it appears that the employer has violated the express provisions of the act, will the court inquire into his intent or motives.[30]

Order as based on past conduct; omnibus provisions. The court may decline to enforce an order of the National Labor Relations Board which is unrelated to any unfair labor practice engaged in by the employer and has no basis in past conduct

Repayment of amounts paid to union
Portion of order which required that amounts deducted from salaries of employees and paid into union's treasury be paid by employer to employees, involved a question of law upon which the court was authorized to rule.—N. L. R. B. v. U. S. Truck Co., C.C.A.6, 124 F.2d 887.

Construction and effect of words or acts
(1) While, it is within the province of the board to determine whether words were spoken or acts were done, the legal effect of the words spoken or acts done, and the determination of whether or not they amount as a matter of law to a violation of the act, may be a legal question and within the power of the court to determine.—Jacksonville Paper Co. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A., 137 F.2d 148, certiorari denied 64 S.Ct. 84, 320 U.S. 772, 88 L.Ed. 462.

(2) The determination of whether language used by employer with reference to labor matters amounts to interference, restraint, or coercion so as to authorize a cease and desist order by board is a question of law determinable from a consideration of language itself.—N. L. R. B. v. J. L. Brandeis & Sons, C.C.A.8, 145 F. 2d 556.

Mixed question of law and fact
(1) Where the employer has a rule forbidding solicitation of any kind in its plant, the question whether the employer may apply such a rule so as to prevent electioneering for a union during the employees' own time, without being guilty of unfair labor practices, is a mixed question of law and fact; it is a question of fact for the board as to the respective benefits and prejudice to the employer and employees in allowing or disallowing electioneering at such times, but it is a question of law, which the court may review, as to the appraisal of, and the priority to be awarded between, the conflicting interests of the employer and employees.—Republic Aviation Corporation v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.2, 142 F.2d 193, affirmed 65 S. Ct. 982, 324 U.S. 793, 89 L.Ed. 1372, 157 A.L.R. 1081.

(2) Even as to the question of law, the court may intervene only in cases where it believes that there is no reasonable warrant for the priority as between conflicting interests actually awarded by the board, and the court should give presumptive validity to the board's decision even though by specific findings the legal question is brought out clearly and definitely; and on a record where the question of law was enmeshed in the mixed question the court declined to consider the question of law.—Republic Aviation Corporation v. N. L. R. B., supra.

Disbelief of employers' witnesses
A suggestion that board had created an operating presumption of noncredibility of employers' witnesses is one which reviewing court has no right to entertain.—N. L. R. B. v. Air Associates, C.C.A.2, 121 F.2d 586.

Actual consideration of record by board
The court, on a showing that procedural requisites have been complied with, and a full hearing granted, will not inquire whether or not the board actually considered the record, or relevant facts thereof, or merely conducted its hearing to supply colorable compliance with the law.—N. L. R. B. v. Lane Cotton Mills Co., C.C.A.5, 108 F.2d 568.

Praiseworthy intentions
In proceeding to enforce order directing employer to cease and desist from unfair labor practices, the question was not whether intentions of employer toward employee were praiseworthy, but rather whether the standard of free and independent action existed.—N. L. R. B. v. Jahn & Ollier Engraving Co., C.C.A.7, 123 F.2d 589.

of the kind forbidden.[31] Ordinarily it will not uphold an omnibus order of the board which enjoins violation of the National Labor Relations Act generally merely because the violation of one or more provisions has been proved.[32] However, where the situation presents such an attitude of opposition to the purposes of the act as to warrant the board in concluding that unfair labor practices generally, and not merely of the type involved in the immediate proceeding, are likely to occur and should be prevented, the court should not undertake to delimit the board's order.[33]

Res judicata. The dismissal of a petition for the enforcement of an order of the National Labor Relations Board is not res judicata of the issues presented by a later petition for the enforcement of another order, where the court did not pass on any of the issues presented but declared the questions moot.[34]

Several grounds of decision. The court may base its decision on more than one ground where the record shows more than one ground in favor of the litigant who prevails.[35] Where a sufficient ground appears for setting aside the board's order, however, the court need not examine other grounds of attack.[36] Thus, where the party attacking an or-

Conduct at particular plant

Where principal issue turned on validity of election at particular plant of employer, order was modified so as to require only that employer cease and desist from interfering with efforts to bargain collectively at that plant.—N. L. R. B. v. Calumet Steel Division of Borg-Wagner Corporation, C.C.A.7, 121 F.2d 366.

Place of distribution of literature

Where it was found that employer's rule against distribution of literature on its parking lots was enforced impartially and not specially to deter union organization, a decree enjoining employer from engaging in activities otherwise regarded as an unfair labor practice could not be broadened so as to cover parking lots which might later be established, where there was no reason to anticipate any attempt to evade injunction.—Le Tourneau Co. of Ga. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.Ga., 150 F.2d 1012.

Employer's disavowal of superintendents' activities

A petition to enforce order requiring company to post notice that it would cease and desist from discouraging employees from joining or assisting the union and taking membership therein was granted where order was supported by evidence that some of company's superintendents had on occasions sought to discourage employees from joining or assisting the union and taking membership therein, notwithstanding such activities were disavowed by the company.—N. "The court believes it should exercise great care in entering general cease and desist decrees in such cases as these whereby a single mistaken act on the part of the employer would, on the face of the decree, transfer from the experience, skill and knowledge of the Board future claims of violations of the Act affecting some entirely different labor organization, in an entirely different way, and place their determination in contempt proceedings in the more restricted area of evidence of court procedure."—N. L. R. B. v. Mason Mfg. Co., C.C.A.9, 126 F.2d 810, 814.

Complaint of single employee

An order of the board requiring reinstatement of employee was too broad in requiring that employer cease in any other manner from interfering with employees in exercise of right of self-organization, to join or assist a union or other organizations, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in concerted activities for such purposes, where board was concerned only with complaint of one employee.—N. L. R. B. v. Servel, Inc., C.C.A.7, 149 F.2d 542.

Order held not too broad

Board's order which required employer to cease and desist from "in any other manner" interfering with employees in exercise of right of self-organization, etc., was not narrowed where the violations of National Labor Relations Act found by the board were the surveillance by employer over employees' union activities and discriminatory discharge of an employee because of his union activities.—N. Opportunity for reconsideration and new record

Where board instituted proceeding for enforcement of its order against an employer, and the employer instituted proceeding to vacate the order, and thereafter the court allowed the board itself to set aside the findings and order, it was not necessary for court to consider the employer's objections to the board's conduct of the proceeding, since the setting aside of the findings and order carried with it the opportunity for reconsideration and making a new record.—Ford Motor Co. v. N. L. R. B., supra.

der of the board establishes his case on the ground of unfairness of trial[37] or lack of due process,[38] the question of the sufficiency of the evidence need not be considered.

Waiver or estoppel to assert particular grounds. An employer by his conduct or omissions may be precluded from urging a particular ground of attack on an order of the National Labor Relations Board.[39] Thus an employer has been held not entitled to complain of the refusal of the board or trial examiner to receive particular testimony, or to grant a continuance to permit the employer to adduce additional evidence, where the employer failed to apply to the court for leave to adduce additional testimony.[40]

(b) Due Process and Fair Trial

On a review of an order of the National Labor Relations Board the court may inquire as to whether there was a fair hearing in the proceedings before the board and a compliance with the requirements of due process.

Where the issue is properly presented, the court has the power and the duty to inquire as to the method by which the board reached its decision,[41] whether the requirements of due process were met,[42] and whether there was a fair and impartial trial or hearing;[43] and the court may set aside or refuse to enforce an order issued without due process of law[44] or based on a trial or hearing which was not fair and impartial.[45]

Presentation of objection in proceedings before board see infra § 28 (131).

Waiver of, or failure to challenge, findings

(1) The employer is not entitled to complain of the absence of a finding by the board in a particular respect where, following the report of the trial examiner, the employer expressly waives its right to findings of fact by the board and consents that the board issue its order based on the entire record.—N. L. R. B. v. Central Missouri Telephone Co., C.C.A.8, 115 F.2d 563.

(2) The employer will be deemed to have admitted the validity of so much of the findings and order relating thereto as remain undisputed and unchallenged by the employer.—N. L. R. B. v. National Mineral Co., C.C.A.7, 134 F.2d 424, certiorari denied National Mineral Co. v. N. L. R. B., 64 S.Ct. 58, 320 U.S. 753, 88 L.Ed. 448.

Estoppel by suggestion as to further proceedings

Where order of board had been made in pursuance of formal stipulation of parties, employer which thereafter objected to proposed vacation of order, and which suggested that any further proceeding should be in form of enforcement proceedings or pursuant to a proper and valid charge, was thereby estopped to object to enforcement of order by court on board's petition.—N. Right to produce evidence and cross-examine Court whose aid is sought for enforcement of order of board has some discretion to see that hearings did not shut off party's right to produce evidence or conduct cross-examination material to issue.—N. L. R. B. v. Indiana & Michigan Electric Co., 63 S.Ct. 394, 318 U.S. 9, 87 L.Ed. 579.

(3) Statement of board's examiner, after all the testimony had been taken, that employer's plant superintendent, who had denied certain statements attributed to him by employees, was a good witness and told the truth, and examiner's refusal when he filed his report to credit superintendent's denials, did not show such bias of examiner as would prevent enforcement of board's order against employer.—N. L. R. B. v. Volney Felt Mills, C.C.A.2, 162 F. 2d 204.

conclusions of the National Labor Relations Board were not supported by evidence does not establish bias and prejudice on the part of the board such as will invalidate its order.[46] Bias of an examiner is not sufficient of itself to upset an order of the board where it does not appear that the examiner committed any error in the admission or exclusion of evidence, or that he conducted himself in a manner which was likely to intimidate any of the witnesses or to prevent any of them from giving any relevant testimony.[47] Further, alleged bias of the trial examiner does not require denial of a petition for enforcement where his report was reviewed by the board and it does not appear that his bias in any way affected the final decision of the board;[48] and similarly assertions that the attorneys for the board who investigated and prosecuted the case were guilty of improprieties have been held irrelevant where the board based its decision on the evidence in the record.[49]

(c) Harmless Error

Enforcement of an order of the National Labor Relations Board will not be refused for alleged error in the proceedings which, in view of all the circumstances, appears to have been harmless.

Error or unjust and arbitrary rulings in the proceedings before the National Labor Relations Board which were harmless and without prejudice to the rights of the parties do not justify the court in setting aside or refusing to enforce an order of the board;[50] and whether an impropriety has resulted in substantial prejudice depends on the peculiar facts of the case, the kind and degree of the impropriety, the appraisal thereof made at the time by the parties themselves, and whether the determination made was affected by the impropriety.[51] An attack on the board's order cannot be predicated on nonprejudicial conduct or actions of the trial examiner,[52] as, for example, in matters involving the admission or exclusion of evidence,[53] examination of witnesses,[54] refusal to permit cross-examination,[55] or denial of a request for a subpœna[56] or for a bill of particulars.[57]

c. Under Railway Labor Act

An order of the National Railroad Adjustment Board may be refused enforcement if the board acted without jurisdiction; but mere technicalities ordinarily will not suffice as a ground of attack.

Although orders of the National Railroad Adjustment Board should not be set aside for technicalities if all substantial rights can be finally protected,[58] an award will not be enforced by the court if the board acted without jurisdiction and beyond its statutory authority.[59] An award of the National Railroad Adjustment Board will not be enforced where there has been a valid compromise of all matters involved in the dispute.[60] In a suit predicated only on the award of the National Railroad Adjustment Board, a question not within the claim or award is not within the scope of the suit and will not be adjudicated.[61]

d. Under State Statutes

Ordinarily the court will review an order of a state labor relations board only to determine the validity of the order, and will not upset the board's order for mere technicalities or harmless error; but the court may inquire into the jurisdiction of the board and also into the arbitrary character of an order.

Under state labor relations statutes containing provisions similar to those of the National Labor Relations Act, it has been held that on an application by a labor relations board for an enforcement order, or by an employer for a review of the order, the only questions before the court are whether the board's findings are supported by sufficient evidence and whether the board's order was proper when made.[62] Immaterial issues will not be considered by the court.[63] The court may not review the processes by which the state labor relations board arrived at its ultimate conclusions,[64] and the fact that the board may have given a wrong reason or have entertained a mistaken view of the law is immaterial if in the end it makes an order which the act authorizes it to make on the facts found.[65] In the absence of arbitrary action, decisions of the board should not be upset by a failure to observe technical niceties or specific forms of procedure[66]

Acceptance of truth of facts

Ruling of trial examiner, who denied request for subpœna was not prejudicial where the board arguendo accepted as true all that the employer offered to prove if subpœnas should be issued.—N. L. R. B. v. Dahlstrom Metallic Door Co., C.C.A. 2, 112 F.2d 756.

Immunity of order from attack

When the board enters an order authorized by the act on a set of facts which are supported by the evidence, that order is immune from judicial attack.—United Shoe Workers of America, Local 132, v. Wisconsin Labor Relations Board, 279 N. W. 37, 227 Wis. 569.

66. Pa.—John Hancock Mut. Life Ins. Co. of Boston v. Pennsylvania Labor Relations Board, 45 Pa.Dist. & Co. 169.

Examiner's failure to file intermediate report

An order of the labor relations board will not be set aside because of the failure of the trial examiner to file an intermediate report, where respondent was given adequate opportunity to file exceptions to the board's preliminary ruling.—John Hancock Mut. Life Ins. Co. of Boston v. Pennsylvania Labor Relations Board, supra.

Lack of clarity in complaint

An order of the board will not be set aside on the ground that the original complaint failed clearly to set forth the nature of the allegedly or by reason of alleged error which does not appear to have been prejudicial.[67] The fact that a hearing before the state labor relations board in connection with a representation proceeding was conducted in conjunction with the hearing relative to unfair labor practices has been held not a ground for refusing to enforce an order of the board.[68]

The powers of the court, however, are more than perfunctory.[69] The court may inquire whether the board's conclusions of law are supported by the facts found[70] and whether the orders or conclusions of the board are reasonable, rather than arbitrary or capricious;[71] also it may inquire whether an impartial hearing was afforded[72] and whether the board acted within the scope of its statutory powers and jurisdiction in making the order.[73]

§ 28(130). —— Limitation by Scope of Record

In proceedings for the judicial enforcement or review of an order of a labor relations board, the court must decide the case on the record as made before the board, rather than on assertions in the briefs or on factual developments occurring after the entry of the board's order.

In proceedings for the judicial enforcement or review of an order of a labor relations board, the case must be decided by the court on the record[74]

Typographical error

The court need not refuse to enforce an order of the board because of a typographical error in one of the board's findings.—Teamsters Local Union No. 222 v. Strevell-Paterson Hardware Co., Utah, 174 P.2d 164.

Trial examiner's refusal to issue subpœnas was held not prejudicial error under the circumstances so as to require denial of a motion to enforce an order of the labor relations board.—New York State Labor Relations Board v. American Surety Co. of N. Y., 51 N.Y.S.2d 803, affirmed 58 N.Y.S.2d 355, 269 App.Div. 970, appeal denied 59 N.Y.S.2d 308, 269 App.Div. 982.

Effect on union's status

With respect to enforcement of a collective bargaining order, substitution of one employee for another in the bargaining unit is of no effect unless the union's status as representative is thereby affected.—In re New York State Labor Relations Board v. Argument of question involving statutory construction

Question whether board acted in excess of its powers which involves question of statutory construction should not be considered or decided without being argued.—Public Service Employees' Union v. Wisconsin Employment Relations Board, 16 N.W.2d 823, 246 Wis. 190.

Inability to waive statutory requirements

An employer, seeking review of state labor relations board's order naming union as collective bargaining agent and ordering employer to negotiate with agent, could not thereby waive right to object to failure of board to follow statutory procedure in issuing cease and desist orders.—Southeast Furniture Co. v. Industrial Commission, 111 P.2d 153, 100 Utah 154.

Facts embodied in supplementary certificate

Release of claim for back pay

Modification of an order directing reinstatement with back pay, on the ground of a release executed by the employees involved, was refused where the release was not made a part of the record; but the court stated that there could be no implication from its ruling that the release might not be a complete defense if the board sought enforcement of the paragraphs requiring back pay.—N. L. R. B. v. Eastern Footwear Corporation, C.C.A.2, 112 F.2d 716.

Acquiescence in incorporation of prior proceedings

By failing to object to incorporation of records in prior proceedings, on appeal to the court from board's decision, union was held to have acquiesced in such action.—McGee v. Local No. 682 of Brotherhood of as made before,[75] and certified by,[76] the board, in the absence of a showing of extraordinary circumstances which prevented the presentation of the matter to the board.[77] The court may not consider statements or alleged facts set forth in a brief but not supported by the record,[78] nor may it determine the case on factual developments which occurred after the board's order was entered.[79] Such transcript as the court may consider must be prepared entirely on the official record.[80]

§ 28(131). —— Presentation of Objection in Proceedings before Board

As a rule, objections not presented to the labor relations board cannot be raised for the first time in proceedings for the judicial enforcement or review of the board's order.

Under the National Labor Relations Act, an objection which has not been urged before the board, its member, agent, or agency ordinarily may not be considered by the court in proceedings for the enforcement or review of the board's order[81] unless

Failure to reserve point in stipulation

A point not reserved by employer

the failure or neglect to urge such objection is excused because of extraordinary circumstances.[82] In this connection the objection must have been sufficiently specific to apprise the board of the question later presented to the court[83] and a general exception to all the recommendations of the trial examiner is not sufficient.[84]

Under state statutes similar to the National Labor Relations Act, objections not raised before the board will not be considered by the court on an appeal.[85]

Railway Labor Act. Only in clear cases should courts called on to enforce an award of the National Railroad Adjustment Board vitiate the award on grounds not urged or presented to the board.[86] The power of the board to render an award on a claim should first be presented to the board rather than to the court,[87] and failure to object before the board on all available grounds renders a subsequent attack subject to the closest scrutiny and requires, in order to sustain the attack, a clear and unmistakable showing of absence of jurisdiction.[88]

§ 28(132). —— Moot Questions; Change of Circumstances

While the court in proceedings to enforce or review an order of a labor relations board will not determine moot questions, enforcement will not be refused merely because of compliance with the order or because changing circumstances indicate that there is no longer great need for the order.

The court will decline to review or enforce an order of a labor relations board, and will dismiss a petition for its review or enforcement, where the questions involved have become moot,[89] and to the extent that an employer has complied with any portion of an order of the board he will not again be required to perform on the granting of a petition to enforce the order.[90] However, the issue for determination by the court is the validity of the order of the board when made,[91] and an order of the board, lawful when made, does not become moot, and will not be refused enforcement, merely because it is obeyed,[92] or because of a change in circumstances[93] indicating that the need for the Death of discharged employee rendered question of reinstatement moot.—Loveman, Joseph & Loeb v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.5, 146 F.2d 769.

Futility of directing collective bargaining

The court will not lend itself to the empty and futile gesture of commanding enforcement of an order of the board directing collective bargaining with a unit which is nonexistent, with respect to questions which are nonexistent, arising out of operations which are nonexistent.—Continental Oil Co. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.10, 113 F.2d 473, case remanded on other grounds 61 S.Ct. 861, 313 U.S. 212, 85 L.Ed. 1292.

New elections

Where new elections had been held, it would be futile to issue a decree enforcing order nullifying earlier elections and ordering new ones, and that part of board's order would be stricken.—N. L. R. B. v. Thompson Products, C.C.A.6, 162 F. 2d 287.

Abandonment of an illegal practice by employer does not cause controversy to become moot.—N. L. R. B. v. Toledo Desk & Fixture Co., C.C. A.6, 158 F.2d 426.

Threat of repetition

Hostile statements of employer's president constituted sufficient threat of repetition of unfair labor practices to warrant enforcement of cease and desist order.—N. L. R. B. v. Burke Mach. Tool Co., C.C.A.6, 133 F.2d 618.

Partial compliance; reservation of rights

The filing by employer of certificate of partial compliance with order of National Labor Relations Board, following receipt of order, furnished no basis for rehearing in proceeding to enforce the order, where certificate stated that notification of compliance was not to be construed as a waiver of any objections to the proceedings.—N. L. R. B. v. Stackpole Carbon Co., C.C.A.3, 105 F.2d 167, certiorari denied Stackpole Carbon Co. v. N. L. R. B., 60 S. Disestablishment of employees' organization

(1) It has been held that orders of the board directing disestablishment of an employees' organization could be enforced, and did not become moot, on the ground that the employer had complied therewith, or that the organization had been disbanded or dissolved.—Independent Employees Ass'n of Neptune Meter Co. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.2, 158 F.2d 448—Wyman-Gordon Co. (Ingalls Shepard Division) v. N. L. R. B., C.C. A.7, 153 F.2d 480—N. L. R. B. v. (2) There is also authority, however, holding that the court may refuse to enforce, as unnecessary, an order of the National Labor Relations Board directing the disestablishment of an employees' organization where it appears that such organization has ceased to function and thus has in fact become completely disestablished.—N. L. R. B. v. Hollywood-Maxwell Co., C.C.A.9, 126 F.2d 815—E. I. Du Pont De Nemours & Co. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.4, 116 F. 2d 388, certiorari denied N. L. R. B. v. E. I. Board's right to press enforcement proceedings

(1) Although performance of trial examiner's recommendations by an employer may lead National Labor Relations Board in its administrative discretion to dismiss petition to enforce its orders, performance does not entitle employer to insist on dismissal.—N. L. R. B. v. Oregon Worsted Co., C.C.A.9, 94 F.2d 671.

(2) Fact that employer had entered into collective agreement with union as bargaining agent and that union sought to have proceedings discontinued did not require board to abandon proceedings brought against employer who had been guilty of unfair labor practices in seeking to prevent unionization of his plant.—N. L. R. B. v. Revlon Products Corporation, C.C.A.2, 144 F. 2d 88.

In accordance with the foregoing rules, enforcement of an order of the board need not be denied because of a subsequently arising controversy as to the proper bargaining agent, or because of a decline in the membership of the union certified.[96] Except in so far as the statutes may provide for the dismissal of a charge of unfair labor practice on voluntary adjustment of the dispute, the court ordinarily has no authority, over objection of the board, to remand a cause with directions to dismiss because of amicable settlement of the controversy between employer and employee[97] or because of a request made by employees that the proceedings be discontinued.[98] Of course, subsequent steps taken for the purpose of evading obedience to an order of the board will not be accorded any consideration.[99] In the final analysis, the determination of whether a question or controversy has become moot so as to preclude enforcement of an order of the board depends on the facts and circumstances of the particular case.[1]

Discontinuance of business by employer. Ordinarily enforcement of the board's orders may be decreed although the employer has gone out of business, where there may be a successor who

(5) A motion to dismiss a petition to enforce an order of the National Labor Relations Board on the ground that the controversy had become moot because it had been settled was denied, where the employer had not performed all that had been required would be a privy bound by the order.[2] An order of the board may be enforced against a corporate employer notwithstanding its voluntary dissolution, particularly where, by virtue of state statutes, the corporate entity may be deemed preserved for the purposes of the proceeding.[3] The death of a partner does not make unenforceable an order of the board directed against a partnership.[4] However, enforcement will not be decreed where the business of the employer has permanently ceased, and there is no probability that it will again be operated, so that any decree of the court would be inoperative.[5]

§ 28(133). Hearing and Determination

a. In general
b. Under National Labor Relations Act
c. Under Railway Labor Act

a. In General

The court may not interfere with a valid determination of a labor relations board, as, for example, in selecting an appropriate bargaining unit or representative, merely because in the judgment of the court a different determination might result in better effectuation of the policies of the labor statutes.

Under provisions of a state labor relations act similar to those of the National Labor Relations Act, it has been held that the court cannot substitute its judgment for that of the board as to whether or not any proposed action would effectuate the policies of the act.[6] A determination of a state labor relations board as to an appropriate bargaining unit or collective bargaining representative cannot be disturbed where reasonable minds might differ on the question, and the action of the board, in exercising its discretion in the matter, does not clearly appear to have been arbitrary or capricious.[7] On the other hand, the court will not enforce an order of the board which is improper or void,[8] and, under appropriate circumstances, the court may set by the board, and controversies had apparently arisen as to the meaning of the settlement.—N. L. R. B. v. Remington Rand, C.C.A.2, 94 F.2d 862, certiorari denied Remington Rand v. N. L. R. Reorganization or transfer of business

An employer cannot be permitted by reorganization or transfer to nullify an order of the board and make it necessary to start new proceedings against the new owner of the business.—N. L. R. B. v. Baldwin Locomotive Works, C.C.A.3, 128 F.2d 39.

Question of fact as to good faith

Question whether there is good faith discontinuance of business by the employer and true change of ownership is question of fact to be tried either before board or before court on application to show cause why enforcement decree was not complied with.—Southport Petroleum Co. v. N. L. R. B., 62 S.Ct. 452, 315 U.S. 100, 86 L.Ed. 718, rehearing denied 62 S.Ct. 637, 315 U.S. 827, 86 L.Ed. 1223—N. L. R. B. v. Bachelder, C.C.A.7, 125 F.2d 387, certiorari denied Bachelder v. N. L. Board's refusal to act

A determination of the state labor relations board, that it would not act in a controversy between a union and an employer charged with unfair labor practices, because no order which board could enter would effectuate policies of labor relations act, was not reviewable by court as an order dismissing a petition, since board acted in the exercise of its discretion.—United Shoe Workers of America, Local 132, v. Wisconsin Labor Relations Board, supra.

Multiple employer unit

In proceedings under state labor relations act to compel school custodians to bargain collectively with their helpers, where labor relations board, after custodians' stipulation, found a multiple employer unit, in the absence of proof indicating that the action of the board was capricious, finding of board was affirmed.—In re New York State Labor Relations Board, 37 N.Y.S.2d 304, affirmed 45 N.Y.S.2d 942, 267 App.Div. 763, affirmed 56 N.E.2d 262, 293 N. Where it was shown that company maintained three plants, that although the largest plant was an integral part of the company's operations it was geographically separated from the other two plants, and that a decided majority of the employees at the largest plant desired certain union to represent them, the board did not abuse its discretion in determining that such union was the representative of the employees of the largest plant, rather than union which was allegedly the choice of the employees of the three plants taken as a unit.—In re Employees of Colfax Station of Duquesne Light Co., 29 A.2d 18, 345 Pa. 458.

aside part of the board's order.[9]

It has been held that, where the findings of the board support its order, the court's judgment should merely affirm the board's order and should not incorporate independent conclusions or findings of the court.[10] It has also been held however, that a court order enforcing an order of a labor relations board should on its face contain sufficient to apprise a party of what is ordered without the necessity of referring to the board's order,[11] and judicial disapproval has been registered of a form of court order which merely commands a party to perform or refrain from performing the acts described in the labor board's order.[12]

An arbitrators' award will not be confirmed in so far as the provisions thereof are ambiguous[13] or in so far as the arbitrator has exceeded his powers in issuing a directive, instead of merely making a finding;[14] and under some circumstances it has been held proper to modify or correct the award to make it accord with the intent of the arbitrators.[15]

A decision of an impartial chairman of an industry made pursuant to the authority given him by agreement between employers and employees in the industry ordinarily may not be disturbed by the courts.[16] In proceedings to vacate or set aside an award of an impartial chairman the court must construe the agreement which the parties made, and may not attempt to reconstruct a new agreement for them.[17] A decision made by a chairman in his legislative capacity, rather than in his capacity as an arbitrator of a dispute, cannot be vacated for his failure to hold or give notice of hearings where power is vested in him by the agreement of the parties to proceed without any such requirements.[18]

b. Under National Labor Relations Act

Although it is for the court in the final instance to see that the National Labor Relations Act is fairly applied, it is primarily for the National Labor Relations Board to determine how the policies of the act should be effectuated and the effect of unfair labor practices expunged. The court may not interfere with a reasonable exercise of discretion by the board in determining an appropriate bargaining unit or representative.

In the hearing and determination of proceedings for the enforcement or review of orders of the National Labor Relations Board, it is the duty of the court to comply with the National Labor Relations Act[19] and to see that the rights guaranteed by the act are amply secured to the employees,[20]

Free speech

The problem of balancing the right of free speech by an employer against the employee's similar right in matters of self-organization is essentially a judicial equation for the court to resolve, and the necessity of reconciling competing interests within the framework of an organized society requires the court to draw the line in the public interest.—N. L. R. B. v. Continental Oil Co., C.C.A.10, 159 F.2d 326.

Responsibility for independent acts of employees

The court is bound to countenance and make no order which will, under the guise of disciplining the employer, charge him with responsibility for independent acts of the employees.—N. L. R. B. v. Riverside Mfg. Co., C.C.A.5, 119 F.2d 302.

Public interest

Responsibility of representing public interest and giving due weight to all relevant factors lies primarily with National Labor Relations Board, and, in absence of compelling evidence that board has failed to measure up to its responsibility, courts should be reluctant to overturn board's considered judgment and substitute their own ideas of the public interest.—N. L. R. B. v. E. C. Atkins & Co., 67 S.Ct. 1265, 331 L.Ed. 398, 91 L.Ed. 1563.

Status as employee

Board has duty of determining in first instance who is an employee for purposes of the act, and its determination must be accepted if it has a reasonable basis in evidence and is not inconsistent with the law.—N. L. R. B. v. E. C. Atkins & Co., 67 S.Ct. 1265, 331 U.S. 398, 91 L.Ed. 1563.

Specialized knowledge of board

The board is for practical purposes supreme on those issues as to which it must be assumed to have a competence, born of its specialized acquaintance with labor relations, such as the extent and persistence of an employer's influence on a succeeding company union.—N. Reinstatement for wrongful discharge

(1) Court would not disturb order of board directing reinstatement of discharged employee, where there was substantial evidence that his layoff, allegedly for union activities and affiliations, was improper.—National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 151 et seq.—Cudahy Packing Co. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.8, 102 F.2d 745, certiorari denied 60 S.Ct. 78, 308 U.S. 565, 84 L.Ed. 475.

(2) Statement of board that reason for requiring offer of reinstatement to employee discharged for unionizing activities and obtaining equivalent employment elsewhere is that without assurance that offer of reinstatement will always be forthcoming employees may hesitate fearlessly to exercise their rights under the statute is binding on reviewing court.—N. L. R. B. v. Regal Knitwear Co., C.C.A.2, 140 F.2d 746, affirmed 65 S.Ct. 478, 324 U.S. 9, 89 L.Ed. 661.

Disestablishment of employees' organization

Whether an order requiring the disestablishment of an employees' organization on the ground of domination, control, or interference by the employer is an appropriate remedy is a matter for the board rather than for the courts.—N. L. R. B. v. Falk Corporation, 60 S.Ct. 307, 308 U.S. 453, 84 L.Ed. 396—N. L. R. B. v. Condenser Corporation of America, C.C.A.3, 128 F.2d 67—N. L. R. B. v. Moench Tanning Co., C.C.A.2, 121 F.2d 951—Roebling Employees Ass'n v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.3, 120 F.2d 289—Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation Limited v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.1, 114 F.2d 930, certiorari dismissed Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation v. N. L. R. B., 61 S.Ct. 448, 312 U.S. 710, 85 L.Ed. 1141.

Placing employees on preferential list

Whether requirement that workmen who had participated in an unsuccessful strike be continued on employer's preferential list would effectuate the policies of the statute was a matter peculiarly within the province of the board.—N. L. R. B. v. C. Nelson Mfg. Co., C.C.A.8, 120 F.2d 444.

Reimbursement of employees

(1) The board has a broad discretion to require the reimbursement of workers for loss of wages discriminatorily imposed, and the court will not interfere with the exercise of such discretion except for the most cogent reasons.—N. L. R. B. v. Winona Textile Mills, C.C.A.8, 160 F.2d 201.

(2) Determination of the board that reimbursement in full of employees for dues checked off to company union is necessary to effectuate the policies of the act must stand unless it is shown to be a patent attempt to achieve ends other than those which can fairly be said to effectuate the policies of such act.—Virginia Electric & Power Co. v. N. L. R. B., 63 S.Ct. 1214, 319 U.S. 533, 87 L.Ed. 1568, rehearing denied 64 S.Ct. 27, 320 U.S. 809, 88 L.Ed. 489.

28. U.S.—Williams Motor Co. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.8, 128 F.2d 960—N. L. R. B. v. West Kentucky Coal Co., C.C.A.6, 116 F.2d 816—N. L. R. B. v. Bradley Lumber Co. of Arkansas, C.C.A.8, 128 F.2d 768.

Board's choice of remedies may not be lightly disturbed by the court and should be accepted unless not supported by the evidence.—Southern S. S. Co. v. N. L. R. B., 62 S.Ct. 886, 316 U.S. 31, 86 L.Ed. 1246—Sperry Gyroscope Co. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.2, 129 F.2d 922—Williams Motor Co. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.8, 128 F.2d 960.

Scope of cease and desist orders

It is the board's province to determine the needed scope of cease and desist orders under the National Labor Relations Act and the function of the courts merely to test as a matter of law whether the scope of a particular order has a reasonable basis in the situation presented.—N. L. R. B. v. May Dept. Stores Co., C.C.A.8, 154 F.2d 533, certiorari denied 67 S.Ct. 72, 329 U.S. 725, 91 L.Ed. ——.

Back pay

The nature and extent of remedy for back pay of reinstated employees are primarily within the administrative discretion of the board which cannot be interfered with as long as the board acts within its authority.—International Union of Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers, Locals No. 15 v. Eagle-Picher Mining & Smelting Co., 65 S.Ct. 1166, 325 U.S. 335, 89 L.Ed. 1649, motion granted 66 S.Ct. 8, 326 U.S. 684, 90 L.Ed. 400.

Posting of notice

(1) Board was held entitled to enforcement of order that employer post a notice that it would cease and desist from interfering with employees' right of self-organization.—N. L. R. B. v. Boss Mfg. Co., C.C.A.7, 107 F.2d 574.

(2) Content of notice which should be posted by employer is for the board to determine, and unless there is an abuse of discretion, court will not disturb it.—Fort Wayne Corrugated Paper Co. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.7, 111 F.2d 869.

Reinstatement notwithstanding dereliction of duty

Where board found that employer had discharged employee because of his activities on behalf of union, a further finding that employee had been taking certain property of the employer for his own use without permission did not establish dereliction of duty so great as to prevent enforcement of board's order to reinstate employee, in view of ar-

ance with the requirements of due process, based on findings supported by adequate evidence, and constituting an appropriate remedy, must be upheld by the court,[29] although the court may not approve of the relief awarded.[30] Even on questions of law the experienced judgment of the board is entitled to great weight.[31]

On the other hand, the manner in which the board has exercised its powers is subject to some control by the courts,[32] and the function of the courts in this respect is by no means perfunctory.[33] On the courts rests the final judicial responsibility, and from them emanates the sole authority, for making the board's orders coercively effective.[34] It is the duty of the court to see that the National Labor Relations Act is properly and fairly applied, and not brought into disrepute by unlawful or palpably unjust applications of it,[35] and the court, on challenge, must determine whether a provision of the board's order is in fact calculated to effectuate the purpose of the act[36] and is in accordance with rangement between employer and employee with respect to such property.—N. L. R. B. v. Gonzalez Padin Co., C.C.A.1, 161 F.2d 353.

Stipulations

(1) An enforcement decree may be rendered where the order of the board was entered on stipulation and the employer did not contest the binding force of its agreement.—N. L. R. B. v. Fickett-Brown Mfg. Co., C.C.A.5, 140 F.2d 883.

(2) Where employer waived a hearing by the board on charges of unfair labor practices pursuant to stipulation in which the form of notice to be posted was prescribed, court in decreeing form of notice to be posted declined to insert a recitation of fact that board's order had been enforced by decree of the court.—N. L. R. B. v. Draper Corp., C.C.A. 1, 159 F.2d 294.

(3) Where a stipulation was entered into between the board and the employer, and the court approved the stipulation and ordered it filed, its provisions were held to have the effect of a decree entered in the proceedings.—N. Retention of drunkard

Order would not be enforced in so far as it purported to hold that habitual drunkard should have been retained and directed employer to make good to him any back pay.—Texas Co. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.9, 120 F.2d 186.

the law.[37] It is the duty of the court to decline to enforce an order of the board which in the opinion of the court is not supported by the law and the facts,[38] as where the board has patently traveled outside the orbit of its authority[39] or has made an order which is not based on proper findings.[40] However, the court may enforce an order of the board, notwithstanding alleged error in respect of particular findings where, even without such findings, there would still be a basis in the record for the board's conclusions;[41] and an enforcement decree may be rendered notwithstanding the board's order may have been technically outside the issues raised by the pleadings before it, where the order was germane to the subject matter before the board, especially where the complaint filed was sufficiently definite to support evidence of unfair labor practices and there is substantial evidence to sustain the findings and order of the board.[42]

While ordinarily the court should make its enforcement decree accord with the order of the board,[43] and should not disturb the order of the board further than necessary to make it conform

Reinstatement of legally discharged employees

Where board had determined that certain employees were legally discharged and had not been discriminated against, board's order, reinstating such employees on ground their work had ceased in consequence of a labor dispute and that they remained employees within meaning of the act, was set aside.—N. L. R. B. v. Mt. Clemens Pottery Co., C.C.A.6, 147 F.2d 262.

Provisions dependent on matters involved in reversal

Where the order of the board is predicated on certain matters, as to which it is reversed, cease and desist provisions, which clearly would not have been made in the absence of such matters, ought not be enforced because of an incidental finding as to an unfair labor practice of minor character which has long since ceased to be operative or to have any effect.—E. Disestablishment of labor organization

Where evidence did not sustain finding that new labor organization was employer-dominated, order directing employer to disestablish new labor organization was set aside.—E. I. Du Pont De Nemours & Co. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.4, 116 F.2d 388, certiorari denied N. L. R. B. v. E. I. Necessity of sustaining all findings

In order to sustain the order of the board it is not necessary to sustain all the findings of the board, but only those on which the order was based.—N. L. R. B. v. M. A. Hanna Co., C.C.A.6, 125 F.2d 786.

Wrongful discharge

An order of reinstatement was enforced notwithstanding the board's finding of discharge for union activity was not supported by the evidence, where the evidence disclosed a discharge on other grounds constituting an unfair labor practice.—N. L. R. B. v. Schwartz, C.C.A.5, 146 F.2d 773.

Back pay

(1) Where order directing employer to reinstate striking employees to the court's determination of the questions argued,[44] nevertheless the court has the jurisdiction and duty judicially to determine for itself the remedial decree that shall be entered,[45] and may adjust its relief to the exigencies of the case in accordance with the equitable principles governing judicial action.[46] It may modify the order of the board,[47] particularly where the parties consent to the modification[48] or where the literal language of the order goes beyond that which the board admits was intended.[49] The court may decree enforcement of part of the board's order and refuse enforcement as to the balance[50] except to the extent that the provisions involved may be inseparable,[51] or it may set aside the board's order in its entirety.[52]

An enforcement decree should be so worded as not to invite litigation as to its meaning,[53] and an employer is entitled to have defined, as exactly as the circumstances may permit, the acts which he may perform without being subject to contempt for violation of the court's enforcement decree.[54]

did not direct employer to give back pay, court could not make an order awarding employees vacation pay.—Republic Steel Corp. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.3, 114 F.2d 820, modified on other grounds 61 S.Ct. 77, 311 U.S. 7, 85 L.Ed. 6.

Decree conditioned on holding of election

The court may condition its decree of enforcement on the holding of an election.—National Licorice Co. v. N. L. R. B., 60 S.Ct. 569, 309 U.S. 350, 84 L.Ed. 799—N. L. R. B. v. American Mfg. Embodying understanding in written agreement

Where the employer refused to make any proposal for an agreement touching wages, hours, and conditions of employment, the court upheld and enforced that part of the board's order which required the employer to bargain collectively, and, if an understanding were reached on any matters with respect to pay, hours, or conditions of employment, to embody such understanding in a written agreement.—Globe Cotton Mills v. Request of board

Where board on a further hearing asked to have set aside its own order, court accepted board's recommendation and set its order aside.—N. L. R. B. v. Sterling Electric Motors, C.C.A.9, 118 F.2d 893.

Allowing board to set aside order

An employer cannot complain because the court instead of setting aside the board's findings and order has allowed the board itself to set them aside, since in either event the findings and order are vacated and the employer is freed from any determination they contain or any obligation they impose.—Ford Motor Co. v. N. L. R. B., 59 S.Ct. 301, 305 U.S. 364, 83 L.Ed. 221.

54. U.S.—J. I. Case Co. v. N. L. R. B., supra.

Determination of bargaining unit. A decision of the board in the matter of selecting a bargaining unit is entitled to great weight,[55] and if reasonable, rather than arbitrary or capricious, should not be interfered with by the court.[56] In this connection the court should not substitute its judgment for that of the board on a question of wisdom or convenience.[57] The court may interfere, however, if the unit designated is unlawful,[58] and, if the facts before the board are such that all reasonable minds must honestly draw the same conclusion from them with respect to what would constitute an appropriate bargaining unit, a wrong determination of the question by the board will be subject to reversal as being purely arbitrary.[59]

Selection of bargaining agent. The action of the board, in the exercise of its discretion, in placing appropriate limitations on the choice of bargaining representatives, on a finding that public or statutory policies so dictate, is binding on the courts if grounded in reasonableness.[60] The act vests power in the board, not in the court, to select the method of determining what representative, if any, employees desire as a bargaining agent,[61] and it is only where the law has been ignored or violated that the court may nullify the certificate of a bargaining representative.[62] If the board deems it appropriate that the bargaining agent be selected by means of an

Redetermination of bargaining agent
(1) Where evidence supported findings of board with respect to effect of employer's unfair labor practices on the attitude of its employees toward their union, the question of what action, if any, should be taken with respect to a redetermination of the bargaining representative of employees was one for the board and not for the court.—N. L. R. B. v. Highland Shoe, C.C.A.1, 119 F.2d 218.

(2) The fact that a union may have lost its majority status after the employer has refused to bargain collectively with it does not authorize the court to direct a new election, this being a matter within the province of the board.—N. L. R. B. v. P. Lorillard Co., 62 S.Ct. 397, 314 U.S. 512, 86 L.Ed. 380—Great Southern Trucking Co. v. N. L. R. (3) Where, as result of strike caused by employer's unfair labor practices, nearly all employees left employer's plant and were replaced by new personnel, a new election as to bargaining agency was not mandatory on ground of changed conditions, but that was a matter to be determined by the board, and its failure to require such election on that ground was not error.—N. L. R. B. v. A. Sartorius & Co., C.C.A.2, 140 F.2d 203.

election, the control of the election and the determination of the steps necessary fairly to conduct that election are matters for the board, and interference in those matters by the court is error.[63] There is no authority granted by the National Labor Relations Act for anticipatory judicial control of election methods so as to permit the court, in effect, to review a proposed election and to supervise the manner in which the election should be conducted.[64]

c. Under Railway Labor Act

A suit to enforce an award of the National Railroad Adjustment Board proceeds as do other civil suits. The trial is de novo and the carrier may be heard on objections to the award. Selection of a bargaining representative by the National Mediation Board is binding on the courts in the absence of abuse of discretion.

In an action under the federal Railway Labor Act § 3, 45 U.S.C.A. § 153, to enforce an award made by the National Railroad Adjustment Board the trial is de novo[65] and the suit, in general, proceeds as do other civil suits.[66] The mere fact that plaintiff obtained a favorable order from the National Railroad Adjustment Board does not, per se, give him a cause of action,[67] and the carrier may be heard on objections, if any, to the award.[68] The court exercises broader powers than merely directing coercive process to issue if satisfied that the proceeding was authorized by law.[69]

Under the statute the district court is empowered to enter such judgment as may be appropriate to enforce or set aside the order.[70] An award of arbitrators under the Railway Labor Act must be set aside by the court if any part of it is not sustained[71] unless the parties agree to a different disposition.[72]

Selection of bargaining representative. The exercise of discretion by the National Mediation Board with respect to questions arising in the holding of an election,[73] and a determination by it as to whether a secret election is the most desirable method of determining the bargaining representative of employees in any particular case,[74] will not be interfered with by the court where no abuse ap-

Presence of observers

Whether employer, union, or employees opposed to union should be represented at polls by observers in election of bargaining representative is exclusively within discretion of the Board.—Semi-Steel Casting Co. of St. Louis v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.8, 160 F.2d 388.

Testimony of passenger

On the trial of an action seeking to enforce an award of the National Railroad Adjustment Board ordering reinstatement of an employee who was discharged for alleged improper conduct toward a passenger of the carrier, where the board did not pass on the employee's guilt or innocence of the charges which caused his removal it has been asserted that "it would seem to be essential" for the carrier to present the testimony of the passenger who complained of the employee's conduct.—Order of Sleeping Car Conductors v. Prima facie case

Where the action is one to enforce an award in favor of an employee whose position had been abolished, plaintiff makes a prima facie case by showing the collective bargaining agreement, the existence of the position, the duties thereof, its abolishment, and the continuance of such duties at the particular office.—Hanks v. Analysis of order and consideration of facts

In determining whether plaintiff has a cause of action for enforcement of an order of the National Railroad Adjustment Board the court may analyze the order and may also consider all the other allegations of fact of the petition.—System Federation No. 59 of Railway Employees Department of American Federation of Labor v. pears. Further, a determination of the National Mediation Board as to the choice of a bargaining representative for employees is binding on the court in the absence of some abuse of discretion.[75] However, the court is not required to enforce a certification which ignores the basic facts of historical development, similarity of employment, community of interest, and well-defined group choice.[76]

Construction of bargaining agreements. In construing collective bargaining agreements between railroads and their employees, great weight is to be given to a determination of the National Railroad Adjustment Board.[77]

On the review of an order of a labor relations board, the court may indulge in proper presumptions, as, for example, that the board has performed its duty, and that its proceedings were regular; but presumptions without a proper basis will not be indulged.

The court in proceedings for the enforcement or review of an order of a labor relations board may indulge in proper presumptions.[78] The decision or action of the board is entitled to a presumption of regularity;[79] there is a presumption that the board performed its duty[80] and made its findings in accordance with the law.[81] It may be presumed that the board properly considered the evidence[82] and briefs[83] presented to it. Presumptions without a proper basis will not be indulged.[84]

§ 28(135). —— Burden of Proof

A labor relations board seeking judicial enforcement of its order has the burden of establishing its right to relief; but in an action brought to enforce an award of the National Railroad Adjustment Board, the defendant has been held to have the burden of showing the invalidity of the award.

A labor relations board in coming before the court to enforce its order must establish its right to the relief for which it prays,[85] and in this con-

Disregard of subordinates' unfairness

The board must be presumed to be capable of resisting any unfair attitudes expressed to it by its subordinates, including its attorneys or the trial examiner.—N. L. R. B. v. Air Associates, C.C.A.2, 121 F.2d 586.

81. U.S.—N. L. R. B. v. Texas Mining & Smelting Co., C.C.A.5, 117 F. 2d 86.

Findings as made by board

Where the board issues an order purporting to be based on findings of fact, there is a presumption that the board made them, and a contrary allegation ought not to be lightly made or sustained.—N. L. R. B. v. Cherry Cotton Mills, C.C.A.5, 98 F.2d 444, rehearing denied 98 F.2d 1021.

Failure to relate all facts

The presumption that the findings were made in accordance with the law is not dissipated by the failure of the board to relate all of the facts pertaining to the ultimate finding.—N. L. R. B. v. Texas Mining & Smelting Co., C.C.A.5, 117 F.2d 86.

nection has been held to have the "burden of proof."[86] The burden has been held on the board, in proceedings for review or enforcement of an order made by it, to sustain its findings;[87] but by other authority the burden of showing that the board's findings and order were without support was held to be on the parties so asserting.[88]

Railway Labor Act. In an action brought under the Railway Labor Act to enforce an award of the National Railroad Adjustment Board, defendant has the burden of showing the invalidity of the award,[89] and this burden extends also to the effect of the award where dependent on mixed questions of law and fact.[90]

§ 28(136). —— Conclusiveness of Board's Findings

a. Under National Labor Relations Act
b. Under Railway Labor Act
c. Under state statutes

a. Under National Labor Relations Act

(a) In general
(b) Inferences or conclusions of fact
(c) Character and sufficiency of evidence

(a) In General

In proceedings to enforce or review an order of the National Labor Relations Board the court does not act as an independent trier of the facts, and is bound by findings of the board which are supported by sufficient evidence.

In proceedings to enforce or review an order of the National Labor Relations Board, the findings and conclusions of the board are in general to be accorded the same weight as the verdict of a jury under the common law,[91] and, if supported by sufficient evidence, are conclusive.[92] As far as a review of the evidence is concerned, the power of the

Pa.—Labor Relations Board v. Union Trust Co., Com.Pl., 89 Pittsb. Leg.J. 343.

Reason for employee's discharge
In a proceeding to enforce an order of the board directing reinstatement of an employee, wherein the board contended that the employee was in fact discharged for union affiliations and activities rather than for the reasons given by the employer, the burden of proof was held to be on the board.—N. L. R. B. v. Montgomery Ward & Co., C.C.A.8, 157 F.2d 486.

Union as bargaining agent
In a proceeding to enforce an order of the National Labor Relations Board requiring the employer to bargain collectively with a designated union, the board was held to have the burden of proving that the union was so organized that mere membership of employees therein constituted the union their designated bargaining agent.—N. L. R. B. v. Hollywood-Maxwell Co., C.C.A.9, 126 F.2d 815.

Expression of opinion; coercive conduct
(1) The board's burden is not sustained with respect to a charge growing out of an expression of opinion by an employer unless the entire statement is given.—N. L. R. B. v. West Ky. Coal Co., C.C.A.6, 152 F.2d 198, certiorari denied 66 S.Ct. 1372, 328 U.S. 866, 90 L.Ed. 1636.
(2) However, it is not necessary, in order to obtain an enforcement decree, for the board to show that normally coercive conduct had its intended or desired effect.—N. L. R. B. v. Aintree Corporation, C.C.A.7, 132 F.2d 469, certiorari denied Aintree Corporation v. N. L. R. B., 63 S.Ct. 831, 318 U.S. 774, 87 L.Ed. 1144.

Cause of strike
In proceeding to enforce order requiring reinstatement of striking employees, employer which had interfered with employees' right to self-organization had burden of showing that strike would have taken place, even if it had not interfered with employees' rights.—N. L. R. B. v. Stackpole Carbon Co., C.C.A.3, 105 F.2d 167, certiorari denied Stackpole Carbon Co. v. N. L. R. B., 60 S.Ct. 142, 308 U.S. 605, 84 L.Ed. 506, opinion supplemented, C.C.A., 128 F.2d 188.

Errors of fact
Whatever mistakes the board may make in appraising the credibility of witnesses and the weight of evidence, and in drawing inferences from conflicting or circumstantial evidence, are errors of fact which, like similar errors committed by a jury, are not subject to correction on review.—N. L. R. B. v. May Dept. Stores Co., C.C.A.8, 162 F.2d 247.

Equivalence of employment

As respects right to reinstatement on order of National Labor Relations Board, equivalence of employment of men who had been refused reinstatement because of connection with, or interest in, union, and who had obtained other employment after refusal of reinstatement, was fact question for board.—Mooresville Cotton Mills v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.4, 97 F.2d 959.

Continuance of membership in union

Question as to presumption of continuation of membership in union was one of fact and rested in sound discretion of board to be decided in light of facts before it.—N. L. R. B. v. Piqua Munising Wood Products Co., C.C.A.6, 109 F.2d 552.

Missing findings

It is not the function of the court to supply missing findings of fact.—N. L. R. B. v. Somerset Shoe Co., C. C.A.1, 111 F.2d 681.

99. U.S.—N. L. R. B. v. Robbins Tire & Rubber Co., C.C.A.5, 161 F.

ceeded lawfully in making up the findings of fact and its order is not a question on which its findings are conclusive.[1] On the question of unfairness or bias of the trial examiner, the board's findings, although not to be lightly disturbed,[2] are not conclusive.[3]

Disagreement within board, or with trial examiner. A determination of the board on the evidence may be conclusive on the court notwithstanding a member of the board dissented,[4] or the trial examiner reached a different conclusion;[5] and the fact that the members of the board disagreed on certain conclusions does not authorize the court to weigh the evidence or hold that the board's order was not supported by substantial evidence, where, in so far as the members of the board did agree, their findings of fact were so supported.[6] The court may, however, properly take into consideration such contrariety of views as bears on the question of the substantial character of the evidence.[7]

(b) Inferences or Conclusions of Fact

Findings of the National Labor Relations Board which are based on reasonable inferences are conclusive on the court notwithstanding the court, if considering the matter as an original trier of the facts, might have drawn a different inference.

It is for the National Labor Relations Board to draw inferences from the evidence or established facts, and the court may not substitute its own inferences or conclusions from disputed facts for those of the board.[8] A reasonable inference or con-

Different reasoning

The court is not privileged to substitute its own reasoning on evidentiary fact issues for that of the National Labor Relations Board.—N. L. R. B. v. Cincinnati Chemical Works, C.C.A.6, 144 F.2d 597.

Inferences from nonconflicting evidence

(1) Even though the evidence is without conflict, if more than one inference can reasonably be drawn from it, the board's determination as to the inference to be drawn binds the court.—Stonewall Cotton Mills v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.5, 129 F.2d 629, certiorari denied 63 S.Ct. 72, 317 U.S. 667, 87 L.Ed. 536.

(2) When the material evidence is entirely without dispute, so that the ultimate or concluding findings are based on nonconflicting evidence, the determination of the court as to the question whether the board's findings must stand or fall must rest on whether the undisputed facts are in law capable of fairly giving rise to the fact inferences the board has drawn, that is, whether reasonable minds, having no interest as accuser or otherwise in the result, but wholly impartial, could, on the evidence, have legally and fairly drawn the fact inferences and made the fact findings which the board did make.—Southern Ass'n of Bell Telephone Employees v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.5, 129 F.2d 410, reversed on other grounds 63 S.Ct. 905, 319 U.S. 50, 87 L.Ed. 1250.

Brezner Tanning Co., C.C.A.1, 141 F.2d 62

novo as an original trier of the facts, might draw a different inference or conclusion;[11] as far as the drawing of inferences is concerned, the sole duty of the court is to determine whether the inferences drawn by the board could reasonably have been drawn.[12] It is only where there is no substantial conflict in the evidence and only one permissible inference may be drawn from it, when, in short, what the evidence amounts to is a question of law rather than of fact, that the court is permitted to set aside the findings of the board as without support in the evidence.[13] On the other hand, the inferences drawn by the board, in order to be binding on the court, must be reasonable inferences,[14] and they must be generated by facts,[15] not surmise, suspicion, or speculation.[16]

(c) Character and Sufficiency of Evidence

Findings of the National Labor Relations Board, in order to be conclusive on the court, must be supported by substantial evidence which has been defined as relevant evidence which a reasonable mind might accept as adequate to support a conclusion. While circumstantial evidence may suffice, mere rumor or suspicion is insufficient.

The evidence required to make the findings of the National Labor Relations Board conclusive must be substantial,[17] and, hence, it is the duty of

Reasonable minds

The court must sustain the board's findings, if reasonable minds, unhampered by preconceptions derived from the technical law of evidence, might differ as to conclusions to be drawn from the evidence presented.

within its jurisdiction[20] are conclusive if supported by substantial evidence, and, consequently, that the function of the court is limited to a determination of whether there is substantial evidence to support the board's findings.[21] Substantial evidence within this rule must amount to more than a scintilla,[22] and must do more than create a suspicion of the existence of the fact to be established.[23] Evidence

D.C.—International Ass'n of Machinists, Tool and Die Makers Lodge No. 35, v. N. L. R. B., 110 F. 2d 29, 71 App.D.C. 175, affirmed 61 S.Ct. 83, 311 U.S. 72, 85 L.Ed. 50, rehearing denied 61 S.Ct. 314, 311 U.S. 729, 85 L.Ed. 474.

Opinion of court

The court is bound by all the fact findings of the board which are supported by substantial evidence, regardless of the opinion of the court as to the real truth.—N. L. R. B. v. Tex-O-Kan Flour Mills Co., C.C.A.5, 122 F.2d 433.

Possibility of prejudice

Where there is substantial evidence to sustain finding court has no power to review the board's decision because it may seem to be prejudiced.—N. L. R. B. v. William Davies Co., C.C.A.7, 135 F.2d 179, certiorari denied William Davies Co. v. N. L. R. B., 64 S.Ct. 82, 320 U.S. 770, 88 L.Ed. 460.

Ground of employees' discharge

A finding of the board as to the real ground for the discharge of particular employees by the employer must be sustained if supported by substantial evidence.—N. L. R. B. v. Central Steel Tube Co., C.C.A.8, 139 F.2d 489—N. L. R. B. v. Gallup American Coal Co., C.C.A.10, 131 F. 2d 665—N. L. R. B. v. Blue Bell-Globe Mfg. Co., C.C.A.4, 120 F.2d 974—N. L. R. B. v. Fashion Piece Dye Works, C.C.A.3, 100 F.2d 304.

Board's concept of substantial evidence is to be accorded liberality.—N. L. R. B. v. American Creosoting Co., C.C.A.6, 139 F.2d 193, certiorari denied 64 S.Ct. 937, 321 U.S. 797, 88 L.Ed. 1086.

Determination of sufficiency after supreme court ruling

Supreme court's reversal of decision of circuit court of appeals setting aside order on ground that order was not supported by substantial evidence precluded another holding that the identical evidence was insufficient.—Virginia Electric & Power Co. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.4, 132 F. 2d 390, affirmed 63 S.Ct. 1214, 319 U. S. 533, 87 L.Ed. 1568, rehearing denied 64 S.Ct. 27, 320 U.S. 809, 88 L. Ed. 489.

Scope of court's function

It is not for the court to decide what findings the board ought to have made on the evidence, but whether the findings it did make are supported by substantial evidence, that is, whether reasonable and unbiased minds could have reached the conclusions and made the findings that were made.—N. L. R. B. v. Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co. of Alabama, C.C.A.5, 129 F.2d 661, certiorari dismissed 63 S.Ct. 1026, 319 U.S. 776, 87 L.Ed. 1723—Stonewall Cotton Mills v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.5, 129 F.2d 629, certiorari denied 63 S.Ct. 72, 317 U.S. 667, 87 L.Ed. 536.

Interpretation of facts

Court is not concerned with board's interpretation of the facts, except to inquire whether there is substantial evidence to support such interpretation.—N. L. R. B. v. Jahn & Ollier Engraving Co., C.C.A.7, 123 F.2d 589.

Reasonable conclusion of ordinary man

In determining the question whether statements by supervisory employees constituted interference, restraint, or coercion, reviewing court must decide whether an ordinary man could reasonably so conclude.—N. L. R. B. v. Pacific Gas & Electric Co., C.C.A.9, 118 F.2d 780.

dence to sustain the findings of the board.[30] Thus it is held that evidence which would be sufficient to take the case to a jury and to support a verdict will support a finding of the board,[31] and, conversely, that the evidence must be enough to justify, if the trial were to a jury, a refusal to direct a verdict.[32]

In determining the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings of the board, the court must consider the evidence and all inferences therefrom in the light which is most favorable to the findings.[33] Further, the evidence in the record must be considered as a whole,[34] and in the light of the general background of labor conditions prevailing in the employer's plant.[35] The statutory provision that the findings of the board as to the facts, if supported by evidence, shall be conclusive does not compel the court to accept findings reached by accepting evidence presented by one side to the controversy with total disregard for other worthy evidence before the board;[36] and the fact that witnesses before the board are or were employees of

Favorable evidence taken as true

(1) The evidence favorable to the order and findings of the board, not repudiated by the board, and not wholly unbelievable, must be taken as true.—Idaho Potato Growers v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.9, 144 F.2d 295, certiorari denied 65 S.Ct. 122, 323 U.S. 769, 89 L.Ed. 615—N. L. R. B. v. Idaho Refining Co., C.C.A.9, 143 F.2d 246.

(2) Court must assume as established all facts that evidence supporting board's determination reasonably tends to prove, and must give to board benefit of all inferences fairly deducible.—N. L. R. B. v. Adel Clay Products Co., C.C.A.8, 134 F.2d 342.

Conflicts resolved against employer

The court, in considering the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain board's findings, must assume that board resolved all conflicts in the evidence against the employer.—N. L. R. B. v. Wm. Tehel Bottling Co., C.C.A.8, 129 F.2d 250.

Background, setting, and circumstances

The facts should be determined not alone as the direct testimony declares them to be but as the background, setting, and circumstances, including interests and motives of witnesses, give color and meaning to the testimony.—Jefferson Elec. Co. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.7, 102 F.2d 949.

Evidence not mentioned in board's decision

The court may consider evidence which supports a finding although not mentioned in the board's decision.—Stewart Die Casting Corporation v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.7, 114 F.2d 849, certiorari denied 61 S.Ct. 449, 312 U.S. 680, 85 L.Ed. 111.

Evidence improperly ignored by board

In determining the question whether order requiring disestablishment of an employees' representative committee was justified by the evidence, court was entitled to consider undisputed and stipulated facts, although such facts were ignored by the board on the mistaken assumption that they were immaterial.—Newport News Shipbuilding & Dry Dock Co. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.4, 101 F.2d 841, reversed on other grounds 60 S.Ct. 203, 308 U.S. 241, 84 L.Ed. 219.

Fair attitude of employer

In determining the question whether evidence sustained finding of employer's violation of National Labor Relations Act, court could take into account unquestioned fair attitude of employer toward union and collective bargaining.—N. L. R. B. v. Shenandoah-Dives Mining Co., C.C.A.10, 145 F.2d 542.

Pressure exerted by employer

In determining the question whether conduct amounted to restraint or coercion, pressure exerted vocally by employer on employee may not be disregarded.—N. L. R. B. v. Lettie Lee, Inc., C.C.A.9, 140 F.2d 243.

a party in whose favor they testified is not alone sufficient to discredit or discard their testimony.[37]

Circumstantial evidence. While circumstantial evidence must be weighed with caution,[38] a finding of the board supported by circumstantial evidence from which the conclusion of the board may legitimately be drawn is binding on the courts.[39]

Competency of evidence. It has been held, under the National Labor Relations Act, at least prior to the 1947 amendment to § 10 (b), 29 U.S.C.A. § 160 (b), which provides that proceedings before the board shall, as far as practicable, be conducted in accordance with the rules of evidence applicable in the federal district courts, that the admission of incompetent evidence does not preclude enforcement of an order of the board, provided there remains competent, relevant, and material evidence sufficient to support the board's findings,[40] and that hearsay may support a finding, at least if more was not conveniently available, and if in the end the finding is supported by the kind of evidence on which responsible persons are accustomed to rely in serious affairs.[41] The court, it has been held, cannot exclude from consideration on review evidence which the board was entitled to take into account.[42] However, a finding of fact cannot rest solely on evidence which is incompetent, irrelevant, or immaterial,[43] such as hearsay evidence.[44]

b. Under Railway Labor Act

Although decisions of the National Railroad Adjustment Board are not final, nevertheless in an action to enforce an award the findings and order of the board are prima facie evidence of the facts therein stated.

Although decisions of the National Railroad Adjustment Board are not final as to either facts or law, with respect to enforcement thereof,[45] they nevertheless have substantive effect[46] and must be given due weight.[47] In an action to enforce an award of the board the findings and order of the board are prima facie evidence of the facts therein stated,[48] and in this connection the findings are probative, not merely presumptive in value,[49] and have effect fairly comparable to that of expert testimony.[50] Where a finding of the National Mediation Board is supported by substantial evidence, it should not be disturbed by the courts, especially where the court concurs in the finding.[51]

c. Under State Statutes

(a) In general

(b) Character and sufficiency of evidence

(a) In General

Under state statutes similar to the federal act, findings of a state labor relations board which are supported by sufficient evidence are conclusive, and the credibility of the evidence and the drawing of inferences therefrom are matters for the board rather than the court.

Under state statutes similar to the National Labor Relations Act it has been held that findings or determinations of a state labor relations board which are supported by sufficient evidence are conclusive on the court.[52] The court's review of the findings of the board is circumscribed,[53] and, as far as concerns a review of the evidence, the question before the court is whether there is sufficient evidence to sustain the findings,[54] and not whether the evidence preponderates in favor of the findings.[55]

Mixed question of fact and law
The ultimate conclusion of the board on a question involving mixed questions of fact and law is entitled, in a suit to enforce the award, to the presumption of prima facie correctness afforded by the statute.—Order of Railroad Telegraphers v. Railway Express Agency, D.C.Ga., 55 F.Supp. 319, reversed on other grounds, C.C.A., 137 F.2d 46, reversed on other grounds 64 S.Ct. 582, 321 U.S. 342, 88 L.Ed. 788.

Conclusion not based on detailed findings
As respects the statutory provision that the findings and order of the National Railroad Adjustment Board shall be prima facie evidence of the facts therein stated, the sustaining of plaintiff's claim was held to be more a conclusion than a finding where detailed findings of fact were not made and the board in its findings found only that it had jurisdiction and that the claim should be sustained in part.—Crowley v. Delaware & H. R. Corp., D.C.N.Y., 63 F. Supp. 164.

Existence of craft
Conclusion of National Mediation Board that a craft does or does not exist is the finding of an ultimate fact which must be supported by the evidentiary facts; and the question whether substantial supporting evidence exists is one of law.—Brotherhood of Railway and Steamship Clerks, Freight Handlers, Express and Station Employees v. It is for the board, rather than for the court, to pass on the weight and credibility of the evidence before the state labor relations board,[56] and to draw reasonable inferences therefrom;[57] and the court cannot substitute its own judgment on questions of fact for the judgment of the board.[58] On the other hand, the court is not bound by findings based on insufficient evidence,[59] and hence it is the duty of

No determination de novo

On a review of the board's findings, the court has no jurisdiction to determine the factual issues anew if there is some evidence before the board reasonably tending to support a finding; the court may not weigh the evidence to ascertain whether it preponderates in favor of the finding or substitute its judgment for that of the board even though the court might have decided the question differently had it been before the court de novo.—In re International Ass'n of Machinists, Lodge No. 1406, A. Different standards for board and court

Under some statutes the standard by which the findings of the board are to be tested by a court on a motion for review are not the same as those prescribed for the board; the party seeking to arouse the action of the board must establish his facts by a clear and satisfactory preponderance of the evidence, whereas on review the findings of fact made by the board are conclusive if supported by credible and competent evidence.—Wisconsin Employment Relations Board v. the court to determine whether the findings are in fact supported by the required amount of evidence.[60] Further, the fact that the board has incorporated a determination as a "finding" of fact does not preclude a review thereof where it actually constitutes a determination of a question of law.[61]

(b) Character and Sufficiency of Evidence

Under some state statutes, findings of a state labor relations board, in order to be conclusive on the courts, must be supported by substantial evidence.

It has been held, under some state statutes, that findings or determinations of the state labor relations board are conclusive on the court if, but only if, they are supported by substantial evidence,[62] or, under some statutes, by credible and competent evidence.[63] The court is not compelled to accept findings arrived at by accepting part of the evidence and totally disregarding other convincing evidence.[64] Under some state statutes it has been held that the court is not authorized to reverse the board for errors in the admission of evidence,[65] and that, where the findings of the board are supported by credible and competent evidence, the fact that hearsay evidence has also been admitted before the

Freedom from technical rules

The statutory freedom of labor relations board from restrictions of technical rules of evidence does not justify orders without a basis in substantial evidence of rational probative force.—New York State Labor Relations Board v. Frank G. Shattuck Co., 20 N.Y.S.2d 949, 260 App.Div. 315.

Consideration of evils sought to be rectified

An examination by the court of the question whether the findings of the state labor relations board are sustained by substantial evidence was held to require that the evils which the state labor relations act seeks to rectify be considered.—New York State Labor Relations Board v. Interborough News Co., 10 N.Y.S.2d 396, 170 Misc. 347.

Status as employees

In a proceeding to enforce a collective bargaining order, the labor relations board's finding that particular persons were employees cannot be disturbed by the court where the finding is at least reasonably permissible and has substantial support from the evidence.—In re New York State Labor Relations Board v. "Substantial and legally credible evidence"

(1) Under some state statutes the conclusiveness of the board's findings depends on whether they are supported by "substantial and legally credible evidence."—W. T. Grant Co. v. (2) Findings of the board that union was dominated or controlled by employer, not supported by any substantial or legally credible evidence, should be vacated, and order directing employer to withdraw recognition from the union should be set aside.—Petition of Union Trust Co. of Pittsburgh, 20 A.2d 779, 342 Pa. 456.

Finding unsupported or based on error of law

If finding of facts by state labor relations board is not supported by competent evidence or is based on an error of law, court has jurisdiction to determine true merits of the case and to modify or set aside, in whole or in part, board's decision and order.—McGee v. Local No. 682 of Brotherhood of Painters, Decorators and Paperhangers of America, A. F. of L., 38 A.2d 303, 70 R.I. 200.

board is not a ground for setting aside or refusing to enforce the board's order.[66]

What constitutes substantial evidence. Substantial evidence means more than a mere scintilla of evidence,[67] and must amount to more than mere suspicion,[68] surmise,[69] uncorroborated hearsay,[70] or rumor;[71] and it may not consist solely of evidence which gives equal support to inconsistent inferences.[72] Substantial evidence means such relevant evidence as a reasonable mind might accept as adequate to support a conclusion;[73] evidence furnishing a substantial basis of fact from which the fact in issue can reasonably be inferred;[74] evidence such that the one weighing the evidence takes into consideration all the facts presented to him and all reasonable inferences, deductions, and conclusions to be drawn therefrom and, considering them in their entirety and relation to each other, arrives at a fixed conviction.[75] The evidence, in order to meet the test of being substantial, must be enough to justify, if the trial were to a jury, a refusal to direct a verdict when the conclusion sought to be drawn from it would be one of fact for the jury.[76]

§ 28(137). Remand to Board

The court may remand the case to the labor relations board for the correction of irregularities or findings or the supplying of deficiencies in the record; and in such case it becomes the duty of the board to act on the issues recommitted to it in accordance with the law.

The court may remand the case to the labor relations board,[77] as, for example, for the purpose of having the board correct irregularities in procedure,[78] supply deficiencies in its record,[79] make additional essential findings,[80] or supply findings in place of those attacked as invalid.[81] Such a remand does not dismiss or terminate the administrative proceeding[82] or encroach on administrative functions;[83] it results simply in having the case returned to the administrative body in order that it may take further action in accordance with the law,[84] and whatever findings or order may subsequently be made will be subject to challenge if not adequately supported or if the board has failed to act in accordance with the statutory requirements.[85]

The court will not remand the case to the board where adequate grounds for remand do not appear[86] or where it appears that in the interest of justice the controversy should be decided without further delay;[87] and where, after the board has once decided against an employer, he applies to the Circumstances subsequent to Board's order

When circumstances arising after issuance of National Labor Relations Board's order may affect propriety of enforcing the order, reviewing court has discretion to decide the matter itself or to remand it to board for further consideration; and, where such circumstances involve complicated or disputed facts or questions of statutory policy, remand to the board is ordinarily in order.—N. General problem

The fact that a finding did not enable the court to distinguish the part of the determination which was within the court's power of review from the part which was within the province of the board was held not to require the court to send the case back for specific findings as to the facts where the problem was a general one applying to industry at large.—Republic Aviation Corporation v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.2, 142 F.2d 193, affirmed 65 S.Ct. 982, 324 U.S. 793, 89 L.Ed. 1372, 157 A.L.R. 1081.

87. U.S.—N. L. R. B. v. National Motor Bearing Co., C.C.A.9, 105 F. 2d 652.

Union's lack of majority

court for a rehearing before the board because of some alleged change in the situation, such an application should be scrutinized with jealousy lest it open the door to abuse.[88]

On remand of the case to the board it becomes the duty of the board to act on the issues recommitted to it by the court.[89] Where the court remands the cause to the board for the purpose of setting aside its previous findings and order, issuing new proposed findings, and making its decision and order on a reconsideration of the entire case, the specified purpose qualifies the court's order remanding the cause and creates a condition which the board is bound to observe;[90] and, if the board within a reasonable time fails to set aside its findings and order, the court can vacate its order of remand and proceed with its consideration of a petition to review filed by the employer.[91] However, if additional essential findings may properly be made on the evidence already received, the court need not require the evidence to be reheard,[92] and, where a remand of the case to the board does not call for a proceeding de novo, the board is not required to reopen any issue as to which its ruling was left unassailed by the court,[93] although in this connection it has been observed that a change in circumstances may make relevant at the second hearing that which was irrelevant at the first hearing.[94]

Resubmission of arbitration. The propriety of a resubmission of a controversy to the same arbitrator or to a new arbitrator rests in the sound discretion of the court.[95]

§ 28(138). —— Issues Involving Reinstatement or Back Pay

The court may remand the case to the labor relations board for the determination of details respecting a back-pay and reinstatement order, in which case the board acts as an original tribunal rather than as a master appointed by the court.

The court may remand the case to the labor relations board for the determination of issues involving back pay and reinstatement.[96] On an issue as to the propriety of an order directing reinstatement, the court may remand the cause to the board to require the board to disclose the basis of its order;[97] and where the board has ordered reinstatement merely on the ground that it has the power to make such order, but has not considered the appropriateness of its exercise of such power, the court may remand the case to the board for a determination of the issue whether reinstatement would effectuate the policies of the statute.[98]

After rendition of a decree enforcing an order of the board which in general terms directs back pay and reinstatement, but which does not specifically provide for such matters as the amounts to be paid or the positions to be tendered, the case should be remanded to the board to work out the details of back pay and reinstatement.[99] If there is a con-

ed evidence in the record, at no time represented a majority of his employes; under such circumstances a court may so determine without remitting the case for further findings.—Pennsylvania Labor Relations Board v. Levin, 50 Pa.Dist. & Co. 79.

Failure to consider bias
Where the case had been remanded to the board for that body to consider bias on the part of one of its members, but the case was considered in its entirety by a new board, the failure of such new board to consider the alleged bias of the former member was held not error.—Berkshire Knitting Mills v. National Labor Relations Board, C.C.A.3, 139 F.2d 134, certiorari denied 64 S.Ct. 1158, 322 U.S. 747, 88 L.Ed. 1579.

Mandate is one method of compelling a proper respect for obligation of the National Labor Relations Board to the court and the respondent on recommitment of an issue to the board, and of making effective that purpose of the National Labor Relations Act which requires prompt action on part of the board.—N. L. R. B. v. Sterling Electric Motors, C.C.A.9, 114 F.2d 738, certiorari dismissed 61 S.Ct. 69, 311 U.S. 722, 85 L.Ed. 471, motion denied Ex parte N. L. R. troversy as to essential facts not determined by the previous findings of the board, the employer should be given a hearing at which he may adduce his evidence and be allowed to present his arguments,[1] and the board should then determine the controversy and make new findings of fact.[2] The court should not assume the duty of determining the controversy and making new findings, either directly or through a commissioner or master;[3] and the board in making its determination on the details of back pay and reinstatement acts as an original tribunal and not as a master or surrogate of the court.[4]

Even where the original order of the board with respect to reinstatement might be regarded as final rather than interlocutory, the court can direct the board to make further findings with respect to reinstatement in view of changed conditions which have developed since the entry of the order.[5] However, a motion of the employer to refer the case to the board for a further hearing on the ground that conditions have so changed that reinstatement is no longer proper will not be granted as of course;[6] the application should be scrutinized with jealousy lest it open the door to abuse.[7] Here too, if the application is granted, the case goes to the board as such, and not to the board as a master of the court.[8]

Remission to arbitrator. Where an arbitrator has failed to determine the precise amount of back pay due to an employee, and under the terms of the submission he should have done so, the court may remit the matter to him in order that he may make his award definite.[9]

§ 28(139) —— Taking of Additional Evidence

Under the National Labor Relations Act and similar state statutes the court on application by either party may remand the case to the labor relations board for the taking of additional material evidence if there were reasonable grounds for failure to adduce the evidence at the previous hearings.

Under the National Labor Relations Act § 10 (e), 29 U.S.C.A. § 160 (e), the court in proceedings for the enforcement or review of an order of the National Labor Relations Board may remand the case to the board for the taking of additional evidence[10] on application by either party to the pro-ber Co., C.C.A.9, 94 F.2d 138, certiorari denied Carlisle Lumber Co. v. N. L. R. B., 58 S.Ct. 1045, 304 U.S. 575, 82 L.Ed. 1539.

Interlocutory nature of decree

A decree enforcing a general order of the board directing reinstatement and back pay is analogous to an affirmance of an interlocutory judgment on appeal; pro tanto it is interlocutory, although it is final as to any of its other provisions which require no further definition.—Wallace Corp. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.4, 159 F.2d 952—N. L. R. B. v. New York Merchandise Co., C.C.A.2, 134 F.2d 949.

Deductions from back pay award

(1) The matter of deducting from a back-pay order actual or potential earnings by the worker or losses which he willfully incurred should be determined by the board, not the court.—Phelps Dodge Corporation v. N. L. R. B., 61 S.Ct. 845, 313 U.S. 177, 85 L.Ed. 1271—Corning Glass Works v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.2, 129 F.2d 967—N. L. R. B. v. (2) Court should not determine the amount that reinstated employees could have earned elsewhere, but should direct that back pay be reduced by that which board, in its discretion, found appropriate.—N. L. R. B. v. Condenser Corporation of America, supra.

Review

Such findings and determination are subject to review by the court, and the prior general decree may be modified or supplemented.—Wallace Corp. v. N. L. R. B., Local No. 129, C.C.A.4, 159 F.2d 952.

Where mere administrative determination is involved, questions affecting reinstatement, as well as those relating to back pay, should be referred to the board rather than be heard in a contempt proceeding.—Wallace Corp. v. N. L. R. B., Local No. 129, C.C.A.4, 159 F.2d 952.

Compliance with mandate of court

Harmless bias of trial examiner

Employer's motion for leave to adduce additional evidence of trial examiner's bias was denied where it appeared that bias, if any, was harmless.—N. L. R. B. v. Air Associates, C.C.A.2, 121 F.2d 586.

Misconduct of board member

An employer was not entitled to take additional testimony to show misconduct of members of board who left office before case was decided.—N. L. R. B. v. Weirton Steel Co., C.C.A.3, 135 F.2d 494.

Transfer of employer's assets

Where order ran not only to corporate employer but also to its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, additional evidence which employer sought to adduce that employer's assets had been transferred and that employer had been dissolved was immaterial.—Southport Petroleum Co. v. N. L. R. B., 62 S.Ct. 452, 315 U.S. 100, 86 L.Ed. 718, rehearing denied 62 S.Ct. 637, 315 U.S. 827, 86 L.Ed. 1223.

Releases signed by employees

Employer was not entitled to adduce additional evidence showing that discharged employees had signed releases acknowledging receipt of payments of money in full settlement of their claims for back pay, since evidence was not concerned with propriety of order, and hence was not material.—N. L. R. B. v. American Potash & Chemical Corporation, C.C.A.9, 98 F.2d 488, certiorari denied American Potash & Chemical Corporation v. N. L. R. B., 59 S. Ct. 582, 306 U.S. 643, 83 L.Ed. 1043.

Exclusion of evidence

(1) Where board refused to hear evidence, failure of employer to adduce such evidence was held reasonable within statute.—N. L. R. B. v. New York Merchandise Co., C.C.A. 2, 134 F.2d 949.

(2) However, an application for leave to adduce additional evidence on the ground that the evidence was unlawfully excluded was denied where the record did not show that the evidence was in fact offered and rejected.—N. L. R. B. v. National Broadcasting Co., C.C.A.2, 150 F.2d 895.

Belief of unconstitutionality of statute

Fact that employers charged with unfair labor practices under National Labor Relations Act believed that act was unconstitutional did not justify their refusal to go to trial on merits or entitle them, subsequent to board's decision, to introduce additional testimony.—N. L. R. B. v. Anwelt Shoe Mfg. Co., C.C.A.1, 93 F. 2d 367.

Respect for discretion of board

An element of fair judicial discretion vested in the circuit court of appeals as to whether or not to order the taking of additional evidence consists of respect for a wide range of discretion in the board itself as to when the board should or should not inquire into allegations of violence or threats of violence by witnesses or parties before it.—N. L. R. B. v. Indiana & Michigan Electric Co., 63 S.Ct. 394, 318 U.S. 9, 87 L.Ed. 579.

purposes[15] and not for the mere purpose of delay.[16] It will not be granted where the allegations in support thereof do not contain allegations sufficient to justify the relief sought[17] or where it appears that the result would not be changed by the introduction of the new evidence.[18]

Under state labor relations acts containing provisions similar to those of the National Labor Relations Act, the court may order additional evidence to be taken before the board[19] when it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that such additional evidence is material[20] and that there were reasonable grounds for failure to adduce such evidence on the hearing before the board or hearing chairman.[21] The granting of leave to adduce additional evidence rests in the discretion of the court.[22]

Provisions of this nature do not contemplate that any evidence be produced before the court, the court's powers being limited to granting leave to present new facts to the board;[23] and the board, after the new evidence has been adduced before it, may then modify its findings on the basis of such additional evidence and file new findings with the same effect as the original findings.[24]

Enlargement of statutory scope of review

The power to adduce additional evidence granted to the circuit court of appeals cannot be employed to enlarge the statutory scope of judicial review.—N. L. R. B. v. Donnelly Garment Co., 67 S.Ct. 756, 330 U.S. 219, 91 L.Ed. ——.

Regularity or fairness of hearing

It has been held that the statutory provisions providing for the adducing of additional evidence before the board manifestly refers to evidence going to the merits of the charge and not to the question of the regularity or fairness of the hearing as conducted by the board.—Cupples Co. Manufacturers v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A. 8, 103 F.2d 953.

Action of board limited to directing election

Circuit courts of appeals have jurisdiction under National Labor Relations Act to order additional evidence to be taken only where proceeding involves an unfair labor practice, and not where the only action taken by the board was the direction of an election.—Inland Container Corporation v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.6, 137 F.2d 642.

Change in union membership

Where employer sought to adduce additional testimony to show a change in membership in union after vote was taken and lack of present majority in favor of union representation, and board took position that, even with added testimony, it would be required to reaffirm order and again direct respondent to bargain with union, court denied motion to remand for purpose of adducing additional testimony as a useless gesture.—N. Failure to show meritorious defense

An application to remand the case to the board to enable the employer to interpose additional evidence will be denied where nowhere in the affidavits presented in support of the application is the evidence on the merits referred to which would challenge that in the record and, at least presumptively, show that there is a meritorious defense.—New York State Labor Relations Board v. Paragon Oil Co., 45 N.Y.S.2d 152.

Inconsistent contention

Request for reopening of case to permit introduction of evidence not presented because of trial examiner's denial of adjournment was held without merit as inconsistent with principal contention in brief that board was guilty of laches in prosecution of charges, for reopening would result in more delay.—New York State Labor Relations Board v. Paragon Oil Co., supra.

§ 28(140). Decree in General

The usual rules governing the construction and operation of judicial decrees apply to decrees rendered in proceedings to enforce an order of a labor relations board. Successors or assigns of the employer may be bound under some circumstances.

The construction and operation of a court decree rendered in proceedings to enforce an order of a labor relations board are governed by the usual rules.[25] A cease and desist order of the board, when sustained by the court, is in effect an injunction.[26] It has been held that the conduct of the employer prior to the date of the board's order determines the character of the acts from which the employer was ordered to cease and desist;[27] but it has also been held that the scope of a consent decree may not be limited on the ground that the acts complained of as violating the decree had no connection with, or similarity to, the acts and practices which brought about the enforcement decree and which that decree sought to remedy.[28]

If the enforcement decree needs any clarification, the proper procedure, it has been held, is an application to the court which rendered it.[29] The court has been held not authorized, however, particularly after an enforcement order has been entered and the proceedings closed, to receive and hear a petition of the board which seeks instruction on the payment of funds to the employees.[30] It has also been held that the court has no authority on a petition for the construction of an enforcement decree, or under the guise of modification or interpretation thereof, to advise an employer as to whether or not its activities constitute a violation of the decree;[31] and it has been asserted that even if the court had such authority it would not make such a determination since its decision on such matter would not be binding on the parties.[32]

Persons bound; successors and assigns. An enforcement decree binds the parties and their privies.[33] Enforcement may be granted of a cease

Pa.—Pennsylvania Labor Relations Board v. Beck, Com.Pl., 25 West. L.J. 170.

25. Enforceable obligation

A decree affirming a back-pay award creates a definite and enforceable obligation against the employer.—N. L. R. B. v. Killoren, C.C.A.Mo., 122 F.2d 609, 137 A.L.R. 510, certiorari denied Killoren v. N. L. R. B., 62 S.Ct. 412, 314 U.S. 696, 86 L.Ed. 556.

"Final," within statute providing that court's judgment enforcing an order of the employment relations board shall be "final" except that it shall be subject to review by the supreme court, does not relate to the finality of the interest of the board in the proceedings, but means merely that a judgment following such proceedings is a final adjudication of the matter litigated unless it be reversed on appeal.—Wisconsin Employment Relations Board v. Allis-Chalmers Workers' Union, Local 248, 25 N.W.2d 425, 249 Wis. 590.

Reinstatement of employees

An enforcement decree which provided for the reinstatement of striking employees was held intended to effect a restoration of the status quo and to contemplate a return of the employees to their former jobs, as against the contention that the decree was satisfied merely by reinstatement to former classifications.—N. L. R. B. v. Remington Rand, C.C.A.2, 130 F.2d 919.

Necessity of awaiting election

Decree enforcing order requiring employer to bargain collectively with designated union was construed as requiring employer to negotiate without waiting for an election, despite proviso permitting the company, or labor organizations at its plant, to petition board for a certification of representatives.—Solvay Process Co. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.5, 122 F.2d 993, certiorari denied 61 S.Ct. 1121, 313 U.S. 596, 85 L.Ed. 1549.

Procedure not favored

In a case in which the court entertained a petition to clarify and interpret an enforcement decree rendered by it, in view of considerations of national defense and the peculiar facts of the case, it stated that its action in so doing was not to be considered as a precedent for other cases in the future.—Solvay Process Co. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.5, 122 F.2d 993, certiorari denied 61 S.Ct. 1121, 313 U.S. 596, 85 L.Ed. 1549.

New corporation

Where corporation transferred its machinery and business to new corporation formed by persons in control of old corporation, the National Labor Relations Board's order against both corporations to cease and desist from unfair labor practices was ordered vacated as against new corporation, since it was not a subsidiary but a distinct and separate entity.—N. L. R. B. v. Hopwood Retinning Co., C.C.A.2, 98 F.2d 97.

Unsuccessful union

Where employer had refused to bargain with a union certified as bargaining representative, such refusal being grounded on alleged fear of economic reprisals by another union, and court could not assume that the unsuccessful union would not respect court's decision affirming the selection of bargaining representative, the enforcement order against the employer would not also be made to run against the unsuccessful union.—N. L. R. B. v. National Broadcasting Co., C.C.A.2, 150 F.2d 895.

Partnership acquiring corporation's business

Finding of facts constituting commission of unfair labor practices by corporation, and that proceeding before labor relations board was not instituted until after partnership had acquired business, did not preclude enforcement of order against partnership.—N. L. R. B. v. Adel Clay Products Co., C.C.A.8, 134 F.2d 342.

and desist order of the board which is directed not only against a particular respondent, but also its "successors and assigns;"[34] the inclusion of "successors and assigns" is permissible on the ground that such parties may under some circumstances be among those reached by the enforcement order,[35] as where they are instrumentalities through which a party seeks to evade the decree, or where they are in active concert or participation with a party in the violation of the decree.[36] It has been considered, however, that provisions of this nature are unnecessary,[37] that they add nothing to the effectiveness of the decree,[38] and that whether one is bound by the decree as a successor or assign of the employer depends on an appraisal of his relations and behavior and not on mere construction of the terms of the enforcement order.[39]

It has been asserted that an employer's officers and agents are bound as privies;[40] but it has also been held improper to direct enforcement against the individuals who were the directors or officers of a corporate employer.[41]

§ 28(141). Compliance with Decree

There must be compliance in good faith with the terms of an enforcement decree.

There must be compliance with a decree enforcing an order of a labor relations board in accordance with its terms,[42] and, where the terms of a consent decree are clear and comprehensive, they may not be defied or disobeyed on the ground that they read more broadly than the employer intended they should.[43] An enforcement decree directing collective bargaining requires the employer to deal with the representatives selected by the employees of an appropriate unit as their sole agent.[44] Such a decree requires bargaining in good faith with the purpose of reaching an agreement,[45] and the obligation to bargain in good faith rests on the labor organization as well as on the employer.[46] Under such a decree the employer may be com-

Enlargement of obligations

The inclusion of "successors and assigns" does not enlarge the employer's own obligation; and, if the employer complies with the order, little by way of obligation may be passed to a successor or assign by the order that is not in any event imposed by statute.—Regal Knitwear Co. v. pelled to enter into a written agreement covering wages, hours, and working conditions which in fact prevail in its business at the time of the proceedings;[47] but the decree does not require the employer to make a collective contract hiring individuals on any other terms than those which, as a matter of voluntary action, it does in fact lay down.[48]

Refusal to confess illegal act. It has been held that the refusal of a person to confess the commission of an illegal act, as ordered by the board, should not be punished under the power of the court to enforce obedience to its decrees.[49]

§ 28(142). —— Contempt

Disobedience of an enforcement decree is punishable in contempt proceedings instituted by the labor relations board; and if there are disputed issues of fact in such proceedings a master may be appointed to take testimony and make findings.

Disobedience of a decree enforcing an order of a labor relations board is punishable by contempt proceedings,[50] and the fact that a case has been remanded to the board for further proceedings in connection with some provisions of its order does not preclude a motion to punish the employer for disobedience of other provisions with respect to which enforcement has been decreed.[51] The board has exclusive authority to institute proceedings for the violation of a court decree directing enforcement of an order of the board.[52] Impossibility of performing the order of the board may be determined in contempt proceedings brought after rendition of the enforcement decree.[53] It has been held that, in determining whether an employer is guilty of contempt for violation of the court's decree, the time elapsing between the date of the board's order and the date of the alleged violation, although not controlling, is not immaterial.[54]

With respect to the significance of a change in conditions since the entry of the board's order, the considerations applicable in an enforcement proceeding are different from those on a proceeding to punish for contempt for failure to comply with an enforcement order already made;[55] thus, although a change in circumstances does not constitute a defense in enforcement proceedings, as discussed supra § 28 (132), in the contempt proceeding the court may in its discretion consider intervening circumstances in determining whether punishment should be administered.[56] The court will not pun-

Refusal to sign agreement as bad faith

Where the bargaining agent for the employees demands no more as to wages, hours, and other conditions than what the employer has already granted and proposes to grant, the parties to the bargaining conference are in agreement, and, being in agreement, an employer who, by his refusal to honor the agreement with his signature, impairs the bargaining process does not bargain in good faith.—N. Matter taken from board's consideration

A cease and desist order takes from the consideration of the board, and makes a matter of court contempt, the employer's relation with disestablished union.—N. L. R. B. v. Sterling Elec. Motors, C.C.A.9, 109 F. 2d 194, affirmed, C.C.A., 112 F.2d 63, set aside on other grounds 114 F.2d 738, motion denied Ex parte N. L. R. Sufficiency of decree to support contempt

An enforcement decree is not void for indefiniteness, and will support contempt proceedings, where it incorporates by reference the provisions of a sufficiently explicit order of the board.—N. L. R. B. v. Hopwood Retinning Co., C.C.A.2, 104 F. 2d 302.

Good-faith challenge of bargaining agent

It has been held that where an employer in good faith challenges the right of a labor organization to act as bargaining agent, although the organization was previously recognized in an enforcement decree as ish for contempt a mere failure to comply with its order in the face of a showing that the order was ambiguous and that the employer construed it in good faith, and in good faith endeavored to comply with it.[57]

An employer cannot be subjected to contempt proceedings for alleged violation of a decree which, in directing enforcement of a general back-pay and reinstatement order, leaves open matters of administrative determination for the board, such as the amount of back pay or the position to be offered; in such case the employer is not liable for contempt until new findings have been made and the original decree modified so as to prescribe definitely what the employer is to do.[58] Thus, in the case of a controversy as to the amount of back pay, the employer cannot be subjected to contempt until a hearing has been held by the board, a decision has been rendered fixing the amount, and the court has incorporated the amount so fixed into its own order.[59] Similarly, whether or not positions involving substantially equivalent employment are open, so that the order of reinstatement can apply to them, and what sort of reëmployment will wipe out the effects of unfair labor practices, are essentially administrative questions, and only after they have been answered is the court in a position to direct the employer to take specific action of such a character that disobedience of its order will justify punishment for contempt.[60]

The court, acting through a commissioner or special master, may take testimony and make findings on an issue of contempt.[61] On the hearing of contempt proceedings, the board should be required to prove by competent and material evidence that its charges are true,[62] and in this connection a rather heavy burden rests on the board.[63] A showing of contempt requires something more than a mere preponderance of evidence,[64] and clear and convincing proof is necessary.[65] The employer and any of its officers who are accused should be accorded the right to confront the board's witnesses, to cross-examine them, and to adduce evidence to disprove the charges.[66] Subpœnas may be issued to aid in the production of evidence on the hearing.[67]

Conclusiveness of commissioner's or master's findings. The findings of a commissioner in contempt proceedings for violation of a decree enforcing an order of the National Labor Relations Board are subject to review by the court under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, 28 U.S.C.A. following § 723c, and not under the rule set forth in the representing a majority of the employees, the court will not treat the employer's refusal to deal with such organization at a subsequent time as a contempt until after the board has certified the result.—N. Finding as to back pay and reinstatement

Where there has been a remand to the board and new findings by it on issues of back pay and reinstatement, which have been embodied in an enforcement decree, if the court desires a finding to be made as a basis for the exercise of the power to punish an employer for contempt for failure to comply with the enforcement decree, the court may either make the finding itself or have it made by a commissioner appointed by the court.—Wallace Corp. v. 67. Subpœnas in lieu of depositions and discovery

In contempt proceeding, where date of hearing was near and the issues did not appear to be particularly complicated, the court as a matter of discretion denied board's motion for pretrial depositions and discovery, and for production thereon of certain books, records, and documents, and in lieu thereof directed clerk to issue subpœnas duces tecum for production on the contempt hearing of books, records, and documents and subpoenas ad testificandum directed to individuals named requiring their attendance at the hearing. —Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.1, 120 F.2d 126.

National Labor Relations Act making the findings of the board, if supported by sufficient evidence, conclusive whether or not the court agrees with them.[68] The findings of a special master should be set aside by the court only where such findings are clearly erroneous,[69] and not simply because the court might have reached a different conclusion;[70] and in this respect it has been observed that a special master who has seen and heard the witnesses, and who could observe their demeanor while testifying, is in a better position than the court to pass on the credibility of witnesses.[71]

Denial of contempt without prejudice. The court may in its discretion deny a motion to punish the employer for contempt without prejudice to a renewal in the event that there is no compliance with the court's order of enforcement within a reasonable time.[72]

§ 28(143). Modification or Vacation of Decree

A decree rendered in an enforcement proceeding may be modified or set aside by the court on an application which is timely presented and based on sufficient grounds.

The court in a proper case may modify or set aside a decree rendered by it in an enforcement proceeding;[73] and even after the expiration of the term it has power to modify an enforcement decree in so far as the decree is executory or continuing.[74] An application for modification of an enforcement decree will be denied, however, where there is a want of equity therein.[75] The National Labor Relations Board is not entitled, as of right, to have a decree procured by it set aside in part and the cause remanded for trial de novo in part;[76] and, where the term at which the decree was entered has expired, the only remedy of the board to obtain vacation thereof has been held to be a bill of review.[77]

§ 28(144). Review of Decree

General rules apply to the review by a higher court of a judicial decree rendered in proceedings to confirm or vacate an award in a labor dispute.

The review of a decree of a lower court in proceedings to confirm or vacate an award in a labor dispute is governed by the usual rules.[78] Objections not raised or considered below will not be considered on appeal.[79]

Right of board to appeal. Under some statutes it has been held that the labor relations board is not entitled to appeal from a decision of a lower court setting aside an order of the board, since the right to such appeal is limited to the actual parties in interest who are concerned and affected, such as the employees and the employer.[80]

D. TERMINATION OF RELATION

§ 29. In General

A contract of employment for a definite term may not be terminated before the end of the term, except for cause or by mutual agreement, unless the right to do so is reserved in the contract.

Where a contract of employment is for a definite term, it may not be terminated at an earlier period,[81] except for cause[82] or by mutual agreement, as considered infra § 33, unless the right to do so is reserved in the contract, infra § 32. However, there may be a tenure or term of office determinable at will.[83] It has also been stated generally that employment is held only by mutual consent,[84] and that at common law the right of the employer to terminate the employment is unconditional and absolute.[85] On the termination of an employment the law implies, in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, that the employee will discontinue the use of all the property of his former employer, returning it where possible.[86]

Failure to furnish work. Where the employee continues in the employment after the employer's failure to furnish work for a part of the service period contracted for, he waives his right to terminate the contract on that ground.[87]

"Labor separations" are classified as "quits," defined infra § 40, "discharges" defined infra § 41, and "layoffs," which have been defined as terminations of employment at the will of the employer, without prejudice to the worker, and may be due to lack of orders, technical changes, or the failure of flow of parts or materials to the job, as needed.[88]

§ 30. Expiration of Term

An employment for a definite period terminates at the end of the period. A periodic employment may be terminated by either party at the end of any particular period.

A contract of employment for a definite period terminates by its own terms at the end of such period.[89] Where the continuation of employment after the expiration of the original employment period is for an indefinite period, or without any fixed limitation as to time, it may be terminated at will by either party.[90] day,[91] or from week to week,[92] or from month to month,[93] either party has the right to terminate it at the end of any particular employment period, without notice.[94] Conversely, an employment from year to year,[95] including a year-to-year employment after a definite term,[96] or from month to month,[97] may be terminated only at the end of the unit period, except by consent of the parties.[98] Likewise, in jurisdictions where the fixing of a salary or wage at so much per unit of service, as at so much per week or month, without specifying the duration of the employment, makes the employment definite for the unit or period so fixed; as considered supra § 8, the employment is terminable by either party at the end of any unit period[99] on the giving of notice;[1] but it may be terminated only at the end of such unit period.[2] A general custom does not arise from the fact that wages are paid periodically that an employee may be discharged on a notice equal to such periods.[3]

§ 31. Indefinite Term

In the absence of a statutory or contractual provision to the contrary, an employment for an indefinite term may be terminated at the will of either party.

In the absence of a statute to the contrary, an employment for an indefinite term may be terminated at the will of either party,[4] regardless of the length

Assumed risk

An employee who accepts employment "until further notice" assumes risk of being discharged for reasons for which he could not be discharged if he had obtained a contract of employment for a definite period of time, and fact that apparent hardship may result from discharge does not authorize courts to change contract.—Sabl v. Laenderbank Wien Aktiengesellschaft, 30 N.Y.S.2d 608, opinion supplemented 33 N.Y.S.2d 764.

Continuance of state of facts

An employment contract which does not cover any specific period, but provides that the employment is to last during the continuance of a certain state of facts, may not be terminated by the employer as long as that state of facts exists except for good cause.—Seifert v. Arnold Bros., 31 P.2d 1059, 138 Cal.App. 324.

8. U.S.—Boatright v. Steinite Radio

payment based on a per cent of the profits of the business in which the services are being rendered,[9] or for transfer to the employee of specified property or an interest therein if profits in a certain amount are realized.[10] The employment has also been held terminable at the will of either party where the term of service is discretionary with one of the parties.[11] The fact, however, that the employment is terminable at will does not deprive the employee of protection of such rights as he may have under the employment.[12]

Permanent employment contracts. As a general rule employment contracts which in some form purport to provide for permanent employment,[13] as where the agreement is for the employee to have a permanent position or permanent employment[14] or employment for life,[15] or the employee is hired to fill a "permanent vacancy,"[16] or where the employment is to be for as long as the master is operating,[17] as long as the employee desires the position,[18] or as long as the employee satisfactorily performs his duties,[19] are terminable at will by either party where they are not supported by any consideration other than the obligation of service to be performed on the one hand and wages or salary to be paid on the other. Where, however, the employee gives consideration in addition to his services, as where he relinquishes a claim for personal injuries or gives some other thing of value, a contract for permanent employment,[20] or as long as the services are satisfactory,[21] is not such an indefinite contract as to come within the rule. Abandonment of business in order to accept employment has been held to constitute independent consideration sufficient to support permanent employment provision of contract.—Weber v. Perry, 21 S.E.2d 193, 201 S. C. 8.

Additional consideration not shown

(1) Contract employing filling station operator was held not supported by consideration in addition to promise to render services, so as to prevent employer from terminating contract at will.—Combs v. Standard Oil Co. of Louisiana, 59 S.W.2d 525, 166 Tenn. 88.

(2) Surrender of seniority services based on two days' services was held insufficient consideration to support permanent employment provision of contract.—Edwards v. Kentucky Utilities Co., 150 S.W.2d 916, 286 Ky. 341, 135 A.L.R. 642.

(3) Agreement of employee to reject other offer and to purchase home of his predecessor in the employment was held insufficient consideration to support permanent employment provision of contract.—Skagerberg v. Blandin Paper Co., 266 N.W. 872, 197 Minn. 291.

21. Cal.—Seifert v. Arnold Bros., 31 P.2d 1059, 138 Cal.App. 324.

has been held in some jurisdictions that a contract of employment for as long as the employee faithfully and diligently, or satisfactorily, performs the duties of his employment may not be terminated as long as the employee performs the prescribed duties in the required manner and is able and willing to do so,[22] even though there is no promise on the part of the employee to remain with the employer for any definite time.[23]

Employment coupled with interest or based on a consideration. It has been held that an employment without any fixed time or term for its duration, which is coupled with an interest or is entered into on a consideration other than the services to be rendered, is intended to continue for a reasonable time[24] and cannot rightfully be terminated at will;[25] and, although in such case the employment is not irrevocable and the employer has the power to terminate the employment at any time,[26] his right to do so is dependent on circumstances and it can be rightfully terminated only under circumstances which render it reasonably just and proper to do so.[27]

Notice. It has been held that an employment for an indefinite term may be terminated without notice.[28] Other authority, however, has held that such an employment may be terminated on notice,[29] on giving the other party reasonable notice,[30] or only on notice to the other party.[31]

§ 32. Termination under Provisions of Contract

a. In general
b. Termination by reason of dissatisfaction
c. Provisions as to notice

a. In General

An employment may be validly terminated on the happening of any event stipulated in the employment contract or in conformity with other provisions thereof.

A contract of employment may be validly terminated on the happening of any event stipulated in the employment contract.[32] It has been held that Depreciation in business does not authorize employer to terminate the contract.—Seifert v. Arnold Bros., supra.

22. Mass.—Kirkley v. F. H. Roberts Co., 167 N.E. 289, 268 Mass. 246.

Ambiguous contract

Even in jurisdictions where the text rule is followed, a contract for such employment which is so ambiguous as to be construed to be one for an indefinite period is terminable at will by either party.—Eggers v. Armour & Co. of Delaware, C.C.A. Iowa, 129 F.2d 729.

Mutuality of termination provision

Where terms of a contract of employment give a privilege to one party to terminate contract, law will extend privilege to the other.—State ex rel. Anderson v. Brand, 7 N.E.2d 777, 214 Ind. 347, 110 A.L.R. 778, reversed on other grounds State of Indiana ex rel. Anderson v. Brand, 58 S.Ct. 443, 303 U.S. 95, 82 L.Ed. 685, 113 A.L.R. 1482, rehearing denied 58 S.Ct. 641, 303 U.S. 669, 82 L.Ed. 1123, mandate conformed to State ex rel. Anderson v. Brand, 13 N.E.2d 955, 214 Ind. 347.

Increase of business

Contract authorizing cancellation by employer if employee failed to increase business specified amount was construed to intend that increase should be measured on yearly and not monthly basis.—Baer v. Toys & Novelties Pub. Co., 216 N.Y. S. 298, 217 App.Div. 92.

Payment of specified amount

(1) Where the contract so provides, the employer may terminate the employment at any time, without notice, on payment of a stipulated amount.—Armstrong v. Standard Ice Co., 195 A. 171, 129 Pa.Super. 207.

(2) Interpretation of contract to permit employer to terminate the employment on payment of five days' wages was not rendered unreasonable by fact that employee agreed not to engage in the business for period of two years after the employment should cease, where employee had sold his interest in the business to the employer and contract clearly gave such right to employer.—Armstrong v. Standard Ice Co., supra.

(3) Under some contracts, in the case of an employment for a definite term to be continued at the will of the parties, the employment may be terminated by the employer, after expiration of the term, by giving notice and making a specified payment.—Ryan v. Kroger Grocery & Baking Co., Ohio App., 31 N.E.2d 698.

(4) Other provisions providing for payments see 39 C.J. p 72 note 61 [g].

Provisions held not to jusify termination

(1) Contract employing salesman

the mere happening of the event provided for will not automatically terminate the contract, but that there must be an affirmative action taken by the one relying on the reservation.[33] The right reserved must be clearly exercised, and language which in part recognizes the contract as in existence will not be sufficient to terminate it.[34]

If the contract expressly so provides, the employment may be terminated at any time by either party.[35] Under the provisions of some contracts the employer cannot properly terminate the employment if he is in default in the performance of his obligations under the contract[36] or until outstanding claims arising under the employment activity have been settled.[37] Also under some employment contracts the employee cannot be discharged without a trial or hearing.[38]

Termination at employer's discretion. A provision in the employment contract authorizing the employer to terminate the employment at his discretion requires him to act on a sound judgment and excludes an arbitrary, unreasonable, or oppressive act;[39] and in such case it is a breach of the contract to terminate the employment before the employee has had an opportunity to perform any services.[40]

Good faith. A reservation of the right to discharge for reasons of the sufficiency of which the employer reserves the right to be the sole judge does not give the employer the right to terminate the contract without a reason or for a false reason.[41] He must act in good faith[42] and not arbitrarily,[43] and the reason or reasons for his termination of the employment must have some relation to particular grounds or conditions specified in the contract sufficient to authorize termination.[44] However, if exercised in good faith, his judgment is not reviewable.[45]

When such right is given an employer, the employee is entitled to the personal judgment of the former, which cannot be delegated to another.[46] Where a contract provides that it may be terminated if a party thereto in good faith so wishes, good faith is presumed,[47] and, where it is stipulated in the contract that the relation is to continue if the parties can agree, either party may terminate the contract at pleasure and without showing any rea-for two years, "predicated" on salesman selling at least ten pieces of apparatus per year, gave employer no right to terminate contract and discharge salesman during term.—Prescott v. Buffalo Fire Appliance Corporation, 260 N.Y.S. 840, 237 App. Div. 198, affirmed 188 N.E. 27, 262 N.Y. 475.

For any cause or reason

(1) A clause in an employment contract authorizing termination of the employment before expiration of the term "for any cause" refers to a cause which would justify the employer in terminating the contract for the employee's breach thereof, and not arbitrarily or at will.—Parsil v. Emery, 272 N.Y.S. 439, 242 App. Div. 653—Vogel v. Pathe Exchange, 254 N.Y.S. 881, 234 App.Div. 313.

(2) Provision in employment contract for specified term which authorizes employer to discharge employee at any time for any reason requires some reasonable ground for discharge, and does not permit discharge at will.—Carter v. Bradlee, 280 N.Y.S. 368, 245 App.Div. 49, affirmed 200 N.E. 48, 269 N.Y. 664.

Pending appeal

Under contract providing for appeal from result of trial, but not providing for supersedeas, employer's right to discharge is not in abeyance pending employee's appeal after trial.—Gary v. Central of Georgia Ry. Co., 141 S.E. 819, 37 Ga.App. 744.

sonable cause for disagreement,[48] although it has been held that the disagreement must be bona fide.[49]

Reference to arbitration. Where a contract of employment provides that any dispute arising in connection with the agreement shall be referred to arbitration in accordance with the provisions of the by-laws of an association, an award adverse to the employee on a reference of a question of misconduct involves the question of the right to dismiss, as a dispute arising in connection with the agreement for service, and is binding on the employee.[50]

Waiver of provision. Where a contract has been terminated by the happening of an event stipulated in the contract, the fact that the employee is retained on the premises under a temporary arrangement is not to be regarded as a waiver of the contract.[51]

b. Termination by Reason of Dissatisfaction

(1) In general
(2) Necessity of good faith

(1) In General

Where the employment contract so provides, the employer may terminate the employment for dissatisfaction with the employee's services.

Where the employment contract so provides, the employer may terminate the employment if the employee fails to perform his duties to the employer's satisfaction,[52] in which case the employer is the sole judge of the sufficiency of his reasons and of the fact that such dissatisfaction exists, and the reasonableness of his dissatisfaction is not open to inquiry.[53] Where the contract may be terminated "for any good reason," the sufficiency of a reason for discharge is open to judicial inquiry.[54] The fact that a servant is retained after his work becomes unsatisfactory is not a condonation of the acts which caused the dissatisfaction and will not prevent his discharge at any time thereafter without a new cause of dissatisfaction.[55] Where the employment is continued after the expiration of a contract, a provision of the original contract that the servant should be retained during satisfaction is not attached to the reëmployment and gives the master the right of removal at will.[56]

It has been held that the incompetency giving rise to dissatisfaction must appear after the contract is made.[57] The employer may not discharge the employee for dissatisfaction with his services prior to the commencement of the employment,[58] or, if satisfaction is to be determined by stipulated tests, until such tests have had an opportunity to function,[59] although events which occurred prior to the execution of the employment contract may have a bearing on whether the employer is actually dissatisfied with the employee's services.[60] Also where a servant is taken on trial for a specified time, the master is entitled to a reasonable time after the expiration of the trial period to give notice of dissatisfaction.[61]

Mere agreement or desire to give satisfaction. Where the employee merely contracts to give satisfaction in his work, and no absolute right of discharge for dissatisfaction is reserved, the arbitrary right to discharge without cause is not thereby given to the employer.[62] Also a contract of employment for a definite time cannot be converted into one dependent on the satisfaction of the employer with the work of the employee by a recital that the employee is desirous of obtaining and filling the position to the satisfaction of the employer.[63]

(2) Necessity of Good Faith

In order to justify a termination of the employment under a contract authorizing its termination because of dissatisfaction with the employee's services, the employer's dissatisfaction with such services must be real and in good faith.

The employer's dissatisfaction with the employee's services must be real and in good faith, and not feigned or assumed, in order to justify his termination of the employment under a provision of the employment contract authorizing its termination because of dissatisfaction,[64] particularly where the contract expressly provides that the right must be exercised in good faith;[65] and it must have been the cause of the discharge,[66] although it has been held that, when an employee is summarily discharged, it is assumed that the discharge is for a cause specified in the contract.[67] So also where, as in the case of a corporation employer, it is provided that the employee may be dismissed if his services are unsatisfactory but only after a hearing of the board of directors, the contract may not be terminated except after such hearing had and conducted in good faith.[68] However, when the contract provides that it may be terminated for unsatisfactory work or other causes, a discharge may be authorized, although not founded on dissatisfaction.[69] A distinction has been made in some decisions, and it has been held that good faith is immaterial in the exercise of the right to discharge for dissatisfaction when the services are to be rendered in a position of trust or confidence[70] or where the employment is of a class involving taste, fancy, interest, and personal satisfaction or judgment.[71]

c. Provisions as to Notice

An employment may be terminated, where authorized by the contract of employment, by the giving of a stipulated notice. The right to notice, or to a particular form of notice, may be waived.

A contract of employment may be terminated by the giving of such notice as the contract provides.[72] A provision in an employment contract for a stated term that it may be terminated before the expiration of the term by the giving of a specified notice merely limits the provision for continuance of the contract for a stated term and is not in irreconcilable conflict therewith.[73] The giving of notice of termination by an employer after the abandonment of the service by the employee does not waive such previous breach of the contract, with an assent to the restoration of their previous relations.[74] A provision of the contract authorizing termination of the employment on the giving of a specified notice is subject to a further provision guaranteeing a minimum period of employment, so as to preclude its arbitrary termination prior thereto.[75]

There must be compliance with a provision in the contract of employment,[76] or with a statutory requirement,[77] for a stipulated notice of the termination of the employment, and a discharge or abandonment without the required notice is unlawful except where valid grounds authorizing the termination of the employment exist.[78] It has been held that if a vis major incapacitates the servant from performing the contract it dispenses with the necessity for notice.[79] A party claiming the benefit of a notice under the contract of employment must show compliance on his part with the terms of the contract.[80]

A notice of termination of employment may be retracted by a subsequent oral agreement of the parties;[81] and the fact that the employment contract is under seal and cannot be changed or modified except in writing and in the same manner of execution does not require a retraction of the notice of termination to be under seal.[82] Where, by the terms of a contract, a party is bound to give notice of an intention to terminate it, and, having given the notice, afterward waives it, he may in fact renew the notice, although the form of his communication purports to insist on the notice which he has waived.[83]

Waiver of notice. The right to notice may be waived by a party, and the question whether his acts constitute a waiver is ordinarily one of fact for the jury.[84] Also an oral notice of termination acted on by the employee has been held to waive or dispense with the necessity for a written notice.[85] Notice is not dispensed with by reason of the fact that the employee has performed no services for a long time prior to the date on which the contract could have been terminated by a proper notice,[86] and the giving of the required notice is not conclusively shown by an admission that the employee, shortly before the contract would have expired by its terms, sought other employment.[87]

§ 33. Termination by Mutual Agreement

Contracts of employment may be terminated by mutual agreement of the parties.

Like any other contract, a contract of employment may be terminated by agreement of the parties, or by their consent, either express or implied.[88]

A contract of employment is terminated by a new agreement,[89] although the new arrangement must be a complete one.[90] Such a result is not established by a mere provision for an additional salary[91] or by a purely supplementary agreement,[92] although a termination of the original employment is shown where an employee remains and works in a different position and at a different wage rate, after being informed that he is ineligible for the position for which he was originally hired.[93] An employee who has notice or knowledge of the substitution of a new employer and thereafter continues in his employment is deemed to have accepted the new employer and to have terminated the relation previously existing with the old one.[94]

Indefinite communications will not suffice to effect a termination by mutual agreement;[95] and if the resignation of an employee is not accepted, as offered, it is not binding on the employee and does not terminate the employment.[96] Also unsuccessful negotiations as to the damages sustained by the employee because of his discharge do not establish a mutual termination of the employment.[97] A demand by an employee for written evidence of his discharge so that he may minimize the damage does not amount to an agreement for the cancellation of the contract.[98] The employment of another to fill a position abandoned by an employee is not a consent to such abandonment,[99] and, where one party declares that he will not perform the contract, the other need not delay until the time for performance before acting on such declaration.[1] Ordinarily the termination of an employment does not affect rights already accrued under it;[2] but an employee's unconditional surrender of his employment contract for a valuable consideration has been held to carry with it every right he has under the contract.[3]

§ 34. Change in Business of Master

An employer who changes or closes out his business or transfers it to another terminates his contracts with his employees, and if the contract obligates him not to disable himself from continuing the employment and is not terminable at will he is liable for its breach; but in such circumstances the employees may quit his employment without incurring any liability and are under no obligation to continue with their employer's successor.

Where a master closes out or changes his business, and thereby becomes unable to perform his contract, the contract is terminated,[4] and, if not

Consent

Employee's acceptance, at time of alleged discharge, of check in full payment for salary and other claims, followed by organization and carrying on shortly thereafter of his own competitive business, constituted acceptance of termination of employment agreement.—Kaufman v. Agreement, whereby employee was released from further performance of services under employment contract in consideration of his promise to pay employer whatever earnings employee might make elsewhere, placed on employee duty of exercising reasonable diligence to secure profitable employment in same or similar business, but did not obligate employee to accept detrimental or unfamiliar employment.—Speer v. Teunisz, supra.

terminable at will, the employee can recover for the breach,[5] provided the contract expressly or impliedly obligates the employer not to disable himself from continuing the employment for the stipulated time.[6] On the other hand, under such circumstances, the employee may quit his employment without liability for damages.[7] Where the master disposes of his business to another without notifying the servant of the change, and the latter continues his services thereafter, the master is liable for the servant's wages as long as he remains without notice,[8] and knowledge by the employee of the negotiations which resulted in the disposal of the business will not release the employer from such liability.[9] Also an individual who operates a business after the dissolution of the corporation which formerly owned it is liable for the wages of those who continue to work in the business.[10]

In case of contracts terminable at will, actual knowledge by the servant of the change of employers, however acquired, will release the employer.[11] Where the employer has reserved the right to terminate the contract in the event of his wishing to merge his business with others, he will be relieved of liability if his option is exercised in good faith.[12] Where an employee recognizes a successor of his master and continues in his employ, the contract of employment is as binding on him in favor of the successor as though the original master had continued in such capacity,[13] and he has been denied any right of action against the original employer personally as for a breach of contract arising from such a transfer of the business,[14] although the fact that an employee continued to work for the buyer of the business has been held not to deprive him of a contractual right to severance pay from the original employer.[15]

An immaterial change in business gives no cause of action for damages.[16] The mere forming of a corporation by an employer and the use of the corporate name in the business for which he has hired the servant do not terminate the employment, where there is otherwise no change in the manner of conducting the business and the employer continues to be the real owner.[17] Performance of an employee's contract is not made impossible, so as to justify its termination, by governmental regulations consequent on the country's being engaged in a war, which regulations partially curtail the business activities the employee was hired to perform.[18]

In determining whether the contract obligates the employer to carry on the business during the employment term each and every part of the agreement, including the consideration agreed on, its nature and value, should be considered,[19] and the mere fact that the employer received a consideration for his promise will not show such an obligation.[20] Unless some provision in the contract negatives it,[21] a contract of employment for a definite term for a compensation, the amount whereof can be earned and determined only by an actual performance of the services over the whole of the stipulated period, implies that the employment will continue uninterruptedly during the term.[22]

contract, enters into the service of the firm,[23] or where the employer and employee become copartners.[24] According to some authority the death of a partner dissolves a contract of employment made by the firm,[25] particularly an employment for an indefinite period which could have been terminated by either of the parties at any time;[26] but there is also authority to the contrary,[27] and it has been held that the contract will not be so dissolved, at least when the business has gone on without a break and the parties have assumed to treat the contract as not terminated.[28] Where the dissolution is voluntary, and the business is not closed, but is continued in the same manner and at the same place, it has been held that the dissolution does not terminate the contract of employment.[29]

§ 35. Insolvency of Master or Appointment of Receiver

A contract of employment is not per se terminated by the insolvency of the master.

A contract of employment is not per se terminated by the insolvency of the master;[30] but sequestration proceedings which work the practical dissolution of a corporation have been held to terminate its contract of employment with an employee.[31] An employer's act in placing his affairs in the hands of a liquidating committee of his creditors will not constitute a breach of the contract of employment when the employee continues to work for the committee.[32] Unless the employee has assented to the termination of his employment[33] he may maintain an action for damages for breach of his contract arising from his nonemployment because of bankruptcy, insolvency, or receivership proceedings against the master,[34] whether such proceedings are voluntary or involuntary;[35] or his claim arising from such breach may constitute a valid claim provable against the insolvent master in insolvency proceedings,[36] or in bankruptcy proceedings, as considered in Bankruptcy § 394 b.

§ 36. Destruction of Employer's Property

An employment contract has been held not to be terminated by the destruction of the employer's property, even though he ceases to do business as a result.

Although there is authority to the contrary,[37] it has been held that a contract between an employer and employee is not terminated by the destruction of the property of the employer by fire, and, although the employer ceases to do business as a result, he is still bound by the terms of his contract.[38] Moreover, the temporary impairment of the business by the destruction of credit records, the commodity in which the business deals, will not authorize a termination of the employment.[39]

§ 37. Death or Disability of Master

The death of the master, or other disability preventing his performance, will terminate an employment contract, at least where the contract requires his personal coöperation for its proper fulfillment.

In the absence of a stipulation to the contrary in the contract of employment,[40] the death of the master during the term will terminate a contract of employment,[41] at least where it involves the obedience or following of directions by the employee and the giving of such directions or orders by the employer, or its proper fulfillment requires the personal coöperation of the employer,[42] unless the contract is capable of performance by his personal representatives in whose service the servant continues.[43] It has been held that a contract of employment cannot be enforced against personal representatives of a deceased master, although the contract expressly provides that they are to be bound by the covenants thereof, when it is of such a nature that it could not have been enforced against the personal representatives of the employee if he had deceased.[44] A contract of employment for a definite term has been held not to be terminated by the master's becoming insane during the term[45] although the contract gives the master the option to terminate it at any time on payment of a certain amount.[46]

§ 38. Death or Disability of Servant

The death, insanity, sickness, or other disability of an employee which prevents the performance of his contract terminates his employment unless the parties have contracted to the contrary.

A contract of employment for personal services is terminated by the death of the servant,[47] or where by reason of insanity,[48] sickness, or other disability,[49] or conviction of a felony[50] he is unable to perform his contract, unless the parties have contracted to the contrary.[51] The fact that the servant is incapacitated by causes beyond his control, or, as it is termed, by the act of God, does not deprive the master of his right to terminate the contract.[52] Illness of the employee, however, does not ipso facto breach the employment contract to such an extent as to terminate it.[53] Whether it is terminated thereby depends on the facts of the particular case, the period of illness, its nature, the kind of service rendered, and other facts.[54] Ordinarily the employment will not be regarded as terminated by the employee's illness if he is able to return to his employment within a reasonable time[55] or if the disability is temporary and does not in any substantial manner prevent performance on the part of the employee;[56] but the protracted illness of an employee whose services are of immediate necessity, or are of such a special character that no ordinary person can perform them, so that it is necessary to obtain the services of a skilled person in order to continue the business, furnishes grounds for the employer to declare the employment terminated.[57] Where a master has wrongfully discharged his servant, he cannot treat the subsequent sickness of the servant while in the employment of another, for which he is not discharged by the subsequent employer, as a cancellation of his own contract.[58]

Notice of termination. Where an employee has been sick for an appreciable length of time whereby he is unable to perform his duties it has been held not to be necessary to give notice of the termination of the contract,[59] as in such case the right to terminate the employment does not depend on giving notice to the employee but on the fact that he has become unable to render the services on whose continuance the employment depends.[60]

§ 39. Military Service of Servant

An employee who voluntarily leaves his employment and enlists in the armed services terminates his contract of employment.

An employee who voluntarily leaves his employment and enlists in the armed services terminates his contract of employment and surrenders his contractual rights thereunder; and, regardless of any statutory right he may have to reinstatement of his employment status on his release or discharge from the service, as considered in the title Army and Navy § 60, he has no rights to employment or cause of action for refusal to employ based on the contract itself.[61]

a. In general

b. Justification

a. In General

An employee who refuses to serve or voluntarily abandons his employer's service, terminates the employment, or, at least, the employer is authorized to rescind the contract and refuse longer to be bound by it.

Where an employee, including one under a contract for permanent employment,[62] refuses to serve or voluntarily abandons the service, whether with or without justifiable cause, the contract of employment is terminated,[63] or, at least, the employer is authorized to rescind the contract and refuse longer to be bound by it.[64] In such case he may not insist on reëmployment.[65] The only way he can return to the abandoned employment is by making a new contract with his employer, who may or may not receive him back, as he sees fit.[66] In the absence of assent by both parties to its cancellation, a contract of employment, however, is not abandoned or merged by the employee's entry into a contract with a third person,[67] even though the subsequent contract calls for the employee's exclusive service.[68] The employer may waive the employee's abandonment of his employment,[69] even though the contract of employment is under seal.[70]

A "quit" has been defined as a termination of employment by the worker because of his desire to leave, and may result from dissatisfaction with wages, hours, or conditions of labor. Sickness, disability, old age, death, or expected call to military service may likewise be influencing factors.[71]

b. Justification

In order to justify an employee in abandoning his employment before the expiration of its term, good and just cause must exist therefor, which generally includes any breach of the employment contract, or act or neglect by the master which is prejudicial to the safety, health, comfort, morals, or reputation of the employee.

An employee is not justified in abandoning his contract before the expiration of the term unless good and just causes exist therefor.[72] For adequate cause, however, he is entitled to refuse to continue his employment;[73] and since, as discussed supra § 31, an employment for an indefinite term may be terminated at the will of either party, an employee who is not bound by contract has the right to quit his employment when he pleases,[74] for any cause, in good or bad faith, with or without malice.[75] Generally speaking, any breach of the express or implied provisions of the contract of employment by the master, or any act or neglect on his part which is prejudicial to the safety, health, comfort, morals, or reputation of the servant, will be deemed a sufficient ground for abandonment.[76] Grounds which have been held sufficient to justify the employee in terminating his contract are the employer's restriction of the employee's rights under his employment contract[77] or the employer's requirement that an employee do something immoral or dishonorable in connection with the performance of his duties,[78] although a mere request for such improper conduct, not insisted on, has been held not to justify the employee's quitting the employment.[79]

The requiring of services not contemplated by the contract constitutes a sufficient ground for abandonment by the servant,[80] unless the servant has consented[81] or made no objection thereto;[82] but a mere request, not insisted on, that the servant perform services outside his duty will not justify an abandonment.[83] Where a contract is made on the condition that the employee is to work under, and be supervised by, a certain manager, the employee is justified in abandoning the service after the manager has lawfully severed his connection with the employer.[84]

An employee is not justified in abandoning his employment by the temporary financial embarrassment of the employer;[85] and a neglect to pay wages elsewhere than at the employer's established place of business does not, in the absence of any demand and refusal, amount to such a violation of the contract as to justify an abandonment.[86] However, the neglect or refusal by the employer to pay the agreed compensation will justify an abandonment by the servant,[87] although, as considered infra § 41, it does not necessarily constitute a discharge.

Whether, in a given case, the ground assigned for abandoning the employment is sufficient is usually a question of fact,[88] the burden of proving which is on the servant.[89]

Waiver. A servant who continues in the employ of the master after a breach which would have justified an abandonment may be deemed to have waived his right;[90] and a restriction of the duties of an employee on the ground that he is unable to give proper attention to all of them has been held not to constitute sufficient grounds for his resignation where he fails to object at the time and continues in the employment for a time thereafter.[91]

§ 41. Discharge

a. General considerations
b. What constitutes discharge

a. General Considerations

As a general rule an employer has the power to discharge an employee notwithstanding the discharge constitutes a breach of the contract of employment.

Although the right to discharge an employee depends on the nature of the employment and the terms of the contract,[92] as a general rule an employer has the power to discharge an employee, even though the discharge constitutes a breach of the contract of employment.[93] Notwithstanding a rule of the employer which requires an open and fair investigation before the discharge of an employee, such an investigation is not essential where an employee admits to the employer the commission of acts which are grounds for discharge.[94]

b. What Constitutes Discharge

Any words or acts which show the master's intention to dispense with the servant's services and which are equivalent to a declaration to the servant that his services will not be accepted are sufficient to constitute a discharge.

A discharge of a servant presumptively means that the employer no longer needs or desires his services, that he is done with him, and all contract relations are at an end.[95] Generally, in order to constitute a discharge there must be some conduct on the part of the employer indicating that he will no longer be bound by the contract of employment,[96] and there must be an intention on his part to abrogate the contract and communication of such intention to the employee by word or act.[97] There is authority for the view, however, that, in order to be effective, it is not essential under all circumstances that the fact of discharge shall be communicated to the employee at the time of discharge.[98]

No set form of words is necessary to constitute a discharge, but any words or acts which show a clear intention on the part of a master to dispense with the servant's services, and which are equivalent to a declaration to the servant that his services will be no longer accepted, are sufficient.[99] Mere

Matters constituting discharge

(1) Employer's statement, to employee that he was unable to pay overdue or accruing salary and suggestion that employee look for an-

expressions of dissatisfaction or even threats to terminate the contract of employment do not, however, amount to a termination of the contract with resultant discharge.[1] Words, although apt for the purpose, will not constitute a discharge when not so treated by the servant,[2] and even declaring the contract terminated will not terminate it unless both parties act accordingly and the relationship is actually discontinued.[3]

A failure to pay the employee as required by the contract,[4] or a mere closing up of the employer's place of business,[5] does not of itself necessarily constitute a discharge, but under some circumstances failure to pay may be tantamount to a discharge,[6] and a refusal to pay compensation as provided in the contract and an offer to pay on a different basis may constitute a rescission of the contract constituting a discharge.[7] According to some decisions a discharge may be effected by acts making it impractical for the employee to perform the duties of his employment,[8] or by a complete transferance to another of duties for the performance of which the employee was hired.[9] The view has been taken, however, that a refusal by the employer to allow the employee to perform duties in his behalf is not a breach of the contract when the employer continues to pay him his salary.[10]

A resolution of a corporation directing officers to discharge an employee will not constitute a discharge where the officers fail to act thereon.[11] A purported discharge by an agent will not operate as such, as against the employer, when the agent was without authority in fact.[12]

§ 42. —— Grounds

a. General considerations
b. Inducing contract by false representation
c. Breach of contract in general
d. Misconduct in general
e. Adverse or disloyal interests or acts
f. Incompetency
g. Neglect of duty
h. Disobedience and insubordination
i. Intoxication or intemperance

a. General Considerations

Unless the contract of employment is terminable at will or the right to discharge without cause is reserved, a discharge of a servant made arbitrarily and without good cause is not justifiable; any act of a servant which injures or tends to injure the master's business, interests, or reputation justifies dismissal of the servant.

As a general rule, unless the contract of employ-other job constituted wrongful discharge of employee.—Rosenthal v. Becher, supra.

(2) Where acts and statements of employer could not reasonably be understood otherwise than plainly indicating its purpose not longer to accept and pay for employee's services in accordance with agreement, there was a repudiation of the contract.—Taylor v. ment is terminable at will under rules discussed supra § 31, or the right to discharge without cause is reserved,[13] an employer is not justified in arbitrarily discharging his employee,[14] but only in discharging the employee for good cause.[15] Generally, however, an employer has the right to discharge an employee at any time for good cause.[16]

As a general proposition, any act of the servant which injures or has a tendency to injure his master's business, interests, or reputation will justify the dismissal of the servant.[17] Actual loss is not essential;[18] it is sufficient if, from the circumstances, it appears that the master has been, or is likely to be, damaged by the acts of which complaint is made.[19] The fact that the contract of employment authorizes the employer to terminate it for certain specified causes does not necessarily prevent the employer from discharging the employee for a legal cause not so specified.[20]

b. Inducing Contract by False Representation

False representations by the servant which induced the making of the contract of employment may justify the master in discharging the servant.

Where the contract of employment has been entered into by reason of the false representations of the servant, the master is justified in discharging him.[21]

c. Breach of Contract in General

As a general rule, a master is justified in discharging his servant because of breach by the servant of an express or implied condition in the contract of employment.

As a general rule, a master is justified in discharging his servant for any breach of the express or implied conditions in the contract of employment,[22] even though the employer has not sustained any injury as a result of the breach.[23] A substantial compliance with the terms of the contract is all that is required[24] and the refusal of a servant to perform services not provided for in the contract will not justify his discharge, as shown infra subdivision h of this section. An employee's refusal to accede to a custom of his employer does not necessarily justify the discharge of the employee.[25] In order to justify a termination of a contract for services of various kinds, dependent on circumstances, a demand and refusal to do some kind of work not inconsistent with the performance of other duties under the contract must be shown.[26] Where, however, there has been a substantial breach of the contract, the master is justified in discharging the servant, even though the omission of the latter to do the thing required of him was produced by causes which he could neither foresee nor control.[27]

d. Misconduct in General

Misconduct of a servant or employee which is inconsistent with the relation of master and servant justifies discharge.

As a general rule, any misconduct inconsistent with the relation of master and servant will justify the master in terminating the contract at any time,[28] and, where an employee's conduct with respect to his fellow employees or others with whom he is brought in contact has a tendency to interfere with the employer's business or with plant or business discipline, the employer may properly discharge such employee.[29]

sufficient to justify a discharge are petty annoyances[30] and slight discourtesies.[31] While, according to some decisions, insolence, which otherwise would afford a sufficient ground, will not necessarily justify a dismissal when provoked by the master,[32] the fact that the employee was goaded and unjustly provoked to the use of abusive language does not necessarily render a discharge unjustifiable.[33]

Where moral turpitude is alleged as the ground of dismissal, the test is, not morality in the abstract, but whether, taking the nature of the servant's employment into account, the acts complained of render him unfit to perform the duties which he had undertaken,[34] or did, or were likely to, affect the master's business injuriously.[35] Actual loss is unnecessary.[36]

Notwithstanding the master has agreed to employ a servant permanently, the discharge of such servant for misconduct may be justifiable.[37]

Misconduct antedating the employment. Misconduct antedating the employment of which the master had knowledge is not a ground for dismissal.[38]

e. Adverse or Disloyal Interests or Acts

An employee's assertion of an interest or performance of acts adverse or disloyal to his employer may justify the discharge of such employee.

One who asserts an interest, or performs acts, adverse[39] or disloyal[40] to his employer commits a breach of an implied condition of the contract of employment which may warrant discharge, as, for example, where one secretly engages in a business which renders him a competitor and rival of his employer,[41] and acts of the employee in violation of an express provision of the contract that the employee shall devote his whole time to his employer's business and shall not engage in any other business may justify discharge.[42] So, also, the taking of secret commissions by the employee on transactions between his employer and third persons warrants a discharge.[43]

The mere engaging in other business, when not inconsistent with a contract of employment, is not a sufficient ground for discharge when the business of the employer is not injured thereby.[44] A mere planning to engage in a competing business at the expiration of the term will not justify a discharge.[45] Negotiations among employees looking to their future betterment by engaging in other pursuits, after the expiration of their existing contract of employment, does not of itself justify a discharge.[46]

f. Incompetency

A breach of a servant's implied agreement that he is competent to discharge the duties for which he is employed may justify his discharge.

A breach of the implied contract on the part of the servant that he is competent to discharge the duties for which he is employed may warrant his discharge.[47] A breach warranting discharge may arise from a series of omissions which, viewed as a whole, warrant the inference that the servant cannot properly exert himself in the interests of the master, even though no one of them would constitute a substantial breach of the contract.[48] As a general rule, however, failure of a servant to perform his work in an absolutely skillful and satisfactory manner does not, in the absence of a special contract, authorize his discharge, but only failure to perform it in a reasonably skillful manner.[49] Where an employee is required to do work not contemplated by the contract of the parties, his manner of doing it is not ground for discharge in the absence of proof of gross negligence.[50]

Permanent employment. Where a master, in settlement of a claim for personal injuries, agrees to employ a man permanently, he is not bound to retain him in employment regardless of his manner of performing his duties, but may discharge him for incompetency,[51] but when, on such a consideration, he agrees to employ the injured employee in a new capacity, he is bound to give him a reasonable opportunity to learn the business before discharging him for such cause.[52]

g. Neglect of Duty

Negligence on the part of a servant in the performance of his duties may justify his discharge.

As a general rule, the discharge of a servant or employee is warranted where he is guilty of habitual negligence in the discharge of his duties[53] or of any neglect which may or does affect his master injuriously.[54] Even though a servant possesses the required skill, frequent and important breaches of duty on his part are a sufficient ground for his discharge.[55] A temporary absenting, however, will not

Failure to make required reports

A requirement that store manager render a daily report to employer showing business transactions of the day for which the report was made, as well as all items of expense which had been paid from the petit cash account, together with receipts therefor, was reasonable, as respects employer's right to discharge manager for noncompliance.—Haiman v. Business results disappointing

As affecting right to discharge, want of diligence on part of employee may not properly be inferred merely because the business disappoints the employer's expectations.—Coon v. Floyd Knox, Inc., 296 N.W. 267, 296 Mich. 305.

necessarily justify a discharge when the nature of the employment and the circumstances warrant the inference that it will not work an injury to the employer.[56]

h. Disobedience and Insubordination

Conduct or acts of an employee which amount to insubordination or disobedience may warrant his discharge.

Conduct or acts of an employee which amount to disobedience or insubordination may justify his discharge,[57] unless, according to some cases, such conduct or acts are provoked or brought about by the conduct of the employer.[58] Thus, generally a refusal or neglect on the servant's part to obey a lawful and reasonable command, order, or rule of the master which, in view of all the circumstances of the case, amounts to insubordination, and is inconsistent with his duties to his master, is a sufficient ground for discharge.[59] The rule has been announced that in this regard "reasonable" refers not only to the kind and character of directions and commands given but also to the manner in which they are given.[60] According to some decisions the willful disobedience of a lawful order of the master is a good cause of discharge,[61] even though the servant fears that he may be prejudiced by obeying,[62] and even though there has been no resulting loss to the employer,[63] but the view has been taken that, in order to constitute just cause for the discharge of a servant, the disobedience must be with respect to matters of such importance in the conduct of the business as reasonably require obedience and fulfillment,[64] and that in such employments as involve a higher order of services, and some degree of discretion and judgment, it would be unauthorized and unreasonable to regard skilled mechanics or other employees as subject to the whim and caprice of their employers or as deprived of all right of action to such a degree as to be liable to lose their places on every omission to obey orders involving no serious consequences.[65] So, with respect to insubordination and disobedience as a ground for discharge, it has been stated that an employee holding a position of responsibility requiring the exercise of power is not bound to as strict adherence to directions of superiors as is one in an employment involving the exercise of less responsibility and discretion.[66] Even a servant who occupies a position of authority and responsibility, however, is subject to the obligation of obedience to the reasonable orders of the master so that such employee may properly be discharged for disobedience to such an order.[67]

In order to justify an employer in disregarding a provision of the employment contract for a notice of a specified period before termination and in discharging the employee forthwith on the ground that the employee has disobeyed a rule, order, or instruction, it must appear that there has been a violation of such rule, order, or instruction,[68] and it has been held that the act or omission constituting the alleged violation must have been intentional,[69] and that the alleged violation must have been willful and deliberate on the part of the employee.[70] While it has been stated that willful disobedience which will constitute a ground for discharge means something more than a conscious failure to obey and that it involves a wrongful or perverse disposition, such as to render the conduct unreasonable and inconsistent with proper subordination,[71] according to some decisions in order to constitute willful disobedience which will justify discharge, it is not essential that the conduct of the employee should be perverse or malicious or that it should be the result of an evil intent toward the employer.[72]

A master may not discharge an employee for violation of a rule of which the employee had no notice,[73] and a refusal of a servant to perform services not provided for by the contract will not justify a discharge,[74] although it has been held that an employee who in an emergency refused to obey an order to perform work outside of his regular duties was rightfully discharged for such refusal.[75]

An employee has the right, without breaching his implied obligation to his employer and thus creating ground for discharge, to protest regarding working conditions and rules of the employer and to request that they be altered,[76] and to that end the employee may discuss the subject with fellow employees and join with them in a peaceful and orderly presentation of the grievance.[77]

i. Intoxication or Intemperance

Intoxication which renders a servant unfit for the full and proper discharge of his duties may justify his discharge.

Independently of any agreement to that effect, the master may discharge the servant when, by intoxication, he unfits himself for the full and proper discharge of his duties,[78] and it is immaterial that at the time of the discharge the employee had quit drinking,[79] and discharge is justifiable even when the employee is not incapacitated thereby, if his intoxication is or may be prejudicial to the master's interests;[80] and this is especially true when the employment, in its very nature, requires sobriety.[81] The fact that liquor was drunk as medicine is no excuse for gross intoxication.[82] Drinking, although excessive, when indulged in, in the entertainment of the employer's customers, with his acquiescence, and for the purpose of promoting their good will, is not a just cause for discharge when such conduct is not harmful, but beneficial to the employer.[83]

§ 43. —— Condonation of Breach of Contract and Effect of Reparation

The master may waive, and thereby lose, his right to discharge a servant for breach of contract or duty. Condonation does not, however, affect the right to discharge because of occurrences subsequent to condonation.

Notwithstanding an employee has been guilty of a breach of contract or misconduct which would justify a discharge, the employer may waive, and thereby lose, his right in this regard.[84] Thus, a master who, after knowledge[85] of a breach of contract or duty on the part of his servant, continues to accept his services without reasonable cause for delay in discharging him[86] is presumed to have waived the breach, and, as a general rule, will not be allowed to set it up afterward,[87] at least as the sole ground for discharge.[88] Although the conduct of the master in continuing to accept the services of the servant after the knowledge of a material breach of contract on the latter's part is prima facie condonation of the offense in the absence of any explanation,[89] it does not, as a matter of law, establish a waiver of his right to discharge him,[90] and the master does not waive his rights by postponing action until after there has been an investigation.[91]

Condonation of the employee's prior breaches of contract is subject to the implied condition of future good conduct in compliance with the terms of the contract.[92] So, condonation can in no respect extend to subsequent offenses or to a continued deficiency,[93] and this is especially so in the latter case, when the objection of the master to the servant's conduct is repeated.[94] It has been held or recognized that subsequent misconduct may be considered in the light of the delinquencies waived;[95] and that the retention of a servant after knowledge of certain breaches of duty does not prevent their use as grounds of discharge when the offense is repeated;[96] in this connection it has been stated that, by continuing employment after knowledge of the employee's breach of duty, the employer waives his right to discharge but does not waive the breach of duty.[97]

Although a servant has fulfilled a stipulation to make reparation for his mistakes, these may justify his employer in rescinding the contract.[98] A request by an employer to an employee to reconsider his refusal to obey an order is not, as a matter of law, a waiver of the right to discharge and a condonation of the latter's breach of contract, although the employee does reconsider and offers to comply.[99] The fact that the employer made payments which he was not required to make after a breach of contract by the employee does not prevent the former from asserting such breach,[1] and a like rule applies with respect to the payment of wages or salary to the time of discharge.[2] The right of a master to discharge a servant for incompetency is not waived by a stipulation of the contract for services that it should be void only by some providential cause or matters beyond the control of either party.[3]

§ 44. Cause for Termination and Statement Thereof

a. In general
b. Statutory provisions in general
c. Actions

a. In General

The motive of the master in discharging a servant is immaterial if legal ground for discharge exists; in the absence of statutory or contractual requirement, the master need not assign a reason for discharge and, as a general rule, may justify a discharge on a ground other than that assigned at the time of discharge.

The motives which actuate the master in discharging the servant are wholly immaterial, if any legal ground exists for such discharge,[4] and it is immaterial whether or not all, or any, of the grounds were known to the master when he discharged the servant.[5] In the absence of statutory or contractual requirement, it is not necessary for the master to assign a reason for the discharge;[6] nor, according to the rule usually recognized, is he estopped to rely on a reason other than, or different from, that assigned at the time of discharge, whether or not known to him at the time of discharge.[7] According to some decisions, however, if an employer, in discharging an employee, assigns a particular cause of complaint, he will be held to it.[8] It has been held that an employer who has disposed of his business and thereupon has discharged an employee cannot fall back on a reserved right to discharge for unsatisfactory service, as a justification of the discharge.[9] Where, under the contract, the employee is entitled to a written notice of termination specifying the cause, a discharge in connection with which a cause is not specified or an insufficient cause is specified is wrongful,[10] and, it has been held that the employer may not justify the discharge by reliance on a cause not specified in the notice.[11]

b. Statutory Provisions in General

Some statutes requiring the issuance to an employee, discharged or leaving the service, of a service letter stating the cause of termination have been regarded as valid, but the validity of some statutes of this general type has been denied; the construction and effect of a valid statute of this description depend largely on its terms.

A statute requiring an employer to issue to an employee, discharged or leaving its service, a service letter stating the character of the service rendered, the duration thereof, and the true cause of the termination, has been regarded as valid,[12] under

(1) A superior's causing the discharge of employee as revenge for superior's failure to alienate affections of employee's wife would impose no liability on employer if discharge was in accordance with superior's right under employer's contract with employee.—Comerford v. International Harvester Co., 178 So. 894, 235 Ala. 376.
(2) Where in such case the contract provided for employment of plaintiff as long as his services were satisfactory, the employer was not liable to plaintiff, notwithstanding employer's refusal to reinstate plaintiff after plaintiff informed employer that his superior maliciously and falsely reported that plaintiff's services were unsatisfactory as revenge for superior's failure to alienate affections of plaintiff's wife, where discharge was in accordance with employer's right under contract.—Comerford v. International Harvester Co., supra.

the police power of the state.[13] It has been held that such a statute does not interfere with the right of the employer to employ or discharge whomever the employer chooses.[14] It has also been held or recognized, however, that a statute of this general type cannot be sustained as an exercise of the police power.[15] The question whether such a statute is violative of constitutional guaranty of freedom of contract or of freedom of speech is discussed in Constitutional Law §§ 211, 213 c (1).

Some statutes requiring the issuance of a service letter showing the cause of discharge and other matters are both remedial and penal.[16] Under such a statute an employee who has been discharged and is otherwise within the terms of the statute is entitled to have a service letter issued to him.[17]

Some statutes which in terms make it the duty of a specified officer of a corporation to issue service letters in effect impose such duty on the corporation acting through such an officer[18] and do not impose the duty on such an officer in his individual capacity.[19] A corporation is required to have an officer who may comply with the statute,[20] and the corporation is not relieved of the duty to issue a service letter by the mere fact that it does not have an officer whose designation is the same as that specified in the statute.[21]

Under some statutes it is essential that the employee shall have been employed for at least a specified period in order to have the right to obtain a service letter,[22] and such employment must have been continuous.[23] A request in accordance with the provisions of the statute for the issuance of a service letter is essential in order to render the employer guilty of a breach of duty for failure to issue such a letter.[24] It has been held that an employer may rightfully refuse to issue a statutory service letter to a discharged employee, except on

16. In Missouri
(1) The rule stated in the text has been announced with respect to the statute, now Rev.St. § 5064, which in the first part imposes the duty on superintendents and managers of corporations to issue service letters and in that respect is remedial, and in the second part renders a superintendent or manager guilty of a misdemeanor for failure to comply with the statute and in that respect is penal.—State ex rel. Terminal R. R. Ass'n of St. Louis v. Hughes, 169 S.W.2d 328, 350 Mo. 869.

(2) The view has apparently been taken that the statute should be given a strict construction by reason of its penal character, but also should be given reasonable application in view of its objects and purposes and evils to be remedied thereby.—Walker v. St. Joseph Belt Ry. Co., App., 102 S.W.2d 718.

(3) It has been laid down generally, however, that the statute is penal and is to be strictly construed.—Lyons v. St. Joseph Belt Ry. Co., 84 S.W.2d 933, 232 Mo.App. 575, certiorari quashed State ex rel. St. Joseph Belt Ry. Co. v. Shain, 108 S.W.2d 351, 341 Mo. 733.

(4) It has also been laid down that the statute must be strictly construed as to those portions which are against employers but liberally construed as to those which are in their favor.—Barrows v. Riss & Co., 179 S.W.2d 473, 238 Mo.App. 334.

the condition that he first surrender a service letter which he had previously received from his employer in accordance with the terms of the contract of employment.[25]

In order to be sufficient, the service letter must satisfy the requirements of the statute.[26]

c. Actions

Under some, but not all, statutes providing for furnishing to an employee a statement of the cause or reason of termination of his employment, the employee has a right of action against the employer for failure to comply with the statute.

Some statutes requiring the issuance of service letters stating the cause of termination of employment and other matter impliedly give a right of action to the employee against the employer for damages for breach by the employer of the duty to issue such a letter.[27] It has been held, however, that a statute which merely provides that an employee may demand the reason of his discharge and that the corporation employing him shall furnish such reason to him, and which does not declare that the failure to furnish such reason shall be unlawful, does not give the discharged employee a right of action against his employer for failure to comply with such statute.[28]

Furnishing a proper service letter after action for failure to furnish such a letter has been commenced has been held not to destroy the cause of action.[29] Defendant in such an action is estopped to deny that a proper request was made for the issuance of the letter, where defendant actually issued an insufficient letter on request of plaintiff.[30]

Actions for wrongful discharge are discussed infra §§ 47–59.

In an action for failure to give a service letter as required by statute, the usual rules as to pleading,[31] evidence,[32] and trial[33] are applicable. Accordingly, plaintiff's counsel, in his argument, has the right to refer to the financial condition of defendant as bearing on the amount of punitive damages, if any.[34]

ter as required by statute, the law presumes actual damages to plaintiff from failure of defendant to issue a proper letter,[35] and plaintiff employee is in any event entitled to recover nominal damages where the employer has failed to furnish the required service letter.[36] In order to authorize the recovery of actual damages that are more than nominal, however, some evidence that plaintiff was refused employment by reason of his not having a service letter is essential;[37] but direct evidence of such refusal of employment is not essential, and the fact of such refusal may be established by circumstantial evidence.[38] In determining damages for failure to issue a service letter, the jury may consider the evidence in the light most favorable to plaintiff employee, and, within reasonable bounds, may fix the loss sustained in view of all elements of damage which can reasonably be inferred.[39]

Punitive damages are recoverable in a proper case in an action for failure to issue a service letter as required by statute,[40] and in such case punitive 38. Mo.—Cook v. Mid-Continent Petroleum Corp., App., 193 S.W.2d 66.

Evidence sufficient

(1) Where evidence warranted finding by jury that plaintiff was hindered and delayed in obtaining other employment by refusal to issue letter, lack of direct and positive evidence that any person or company refused to employ plaintiff because he had no such letter from defendant did not bar his recovery of substantial damages, and court did not err in refusing defendant's requested instruction that plaintiff could not recover more than nominal damages, or in giving plaintiff's instruction authorizing recovery of actual damages.—Burens v. Wolfe Wear-U-Well Corporation, 158 S.W.2d 175, 236 Mo.App. 892.

When recoverable

(1) Defendant corporation may be liable for punitive damages if its actions and those of its representatives are shown to have been willful, malicious, and wrongful and without legal justification or excuse or if such actions were the results of actual malice, spite, and ill will toward plaintiff.—Walker v. St. Joseph Belt Ry. Co., Mo.App., 102 S.W.2d 718.

(2) In order to permit recovery of punitive damages, it is not necessary to show actual malice.—Stephens v. Lever Bros. Co., Mo.App., 155 S.W.2d 540—Hall v. St. Louis-San Francisco Ry. Co., 28 S.W.2d 687, 224 Mo.App. 431.

(3) Malice in law, which is the intentional doing of a wrongful act, without just cause or excuse, is sufficient.—Ackerman v. Thompson, Mo., 202 S.W.2d 795—Hall v. St. Louis-San Francisco Ry. Co., supra.

(4) Negligence amounting to positive misconduct may be sufficient.—Stephens v. Lever Bros. Co., supra.

(5) In case of such negligence, ignorance of the law does not prevent the award of punitive damages.—Stephens v. Lever Bros., supra.

(6) Where defendant corporation's officer had conscious knowledge that he was not complying with the statute requiring the issuance of a service letter, there was ground for awarding punitive damages.—Van Sickle v. Katz Drug Co., 151 S.W.2d 489, 235 Mo.App. 952.

(7) It has been laid down that a "malicious act" which would warrant imposition of punitive damages is a wrongful act intentionally done without cause or excuse.—Chrisman v. Terminal R. Ass'n of St. Louis, 157 S.W.2d 230, 237 Mo.App. 181, certiorari quashed State ex rel. Terminal R. R. Ass'n of St. Louis v. Hughes, 169 S.W.2d 328, 350 Mo. 869.

(8) In this connection it has been stated that, "if the proof be sufficient the jury may affirmatively find that there was a wrongful act, intentionally done without cause or excuse, and that there was actual malice, or the facts may be such that the jury may fairly and reasonably draw the inference of malice from a wrongful act, and this would be legal malice."—Chrisman v. Terminal R. Ass'n of St. Louis, 157 S.W.2d 230, 235, 235 Mo.App. 181, certiorari quashed State ex rel. Terminal R. R. Ass'n of St. Louis v. Hughes, 169 S.W.2d 328, 350 Mo. 869.

Sufficiency of evidence

(1) In order to authorize submission to the jury of question of punitive damages based on spite and ill will, the evidence must be substantial; a scintilla or modicum of evidence is not sufficient and the inferences must be reasonable and not forced.—Hatton v. Carder Wholesale Grocery Co., 150 S.W.2d 1096, 235 Mo.App. 1198.

(2) Evidence held sufficient to justify submission of issue of malice to jury, or to sustain a finding of malice.—Stephens v. Lever Bros. Co., Mo.App., 155 S.W.2d 540—Gerharter v. Mitchellhill Seed Co., Mo.App., 157 S.W.2d 577—Chrisman v. Terminal R. Ass'n of St. Louis, 157 S.W.2d 230, 237 Mo.App. 181, certiorari quashed State ex rel. Terminal R. R. Ass'n of St. Louis v. Co., 84 S.W.2d 933, 232 Mo.App. 575, certiorari quashed State ex rel. St. Joseph Belt Ry. Co. v. Shain, 108 S.W.2d 351, 341 Mo. 733—Hall v. St. Louis-San Francisco Ry. Co., 28 S.W.2d 687, 224 Mo.App. 431.

(3) Evidence held insufficient to damages may be awarded, even though the recovery of actual damages is only nominal.[41] In such case it is within the discretion of the jury whether or not punitive damages should be allowed,[42] as is also the question as to the amount which should be awarded.[43] The amount of actual damages awarded does not furnish a guide for determining the amount of punitive damages where only nominal damages are awarded pursuant to the court's instructions because of plaintiff's inability to introduce competent evidence of greater actual damages.[44]

Defendant is not entitled to show in mitigation of damages for failure to issue a service letter as required by statute unemployment compensation received by plaintiff[45] or payments to plaintiff made from collateral sources, whether in compensation or as gratuities.[46] The fact that a proper service letter was furnished after the commencement of an action for failure to furnish such a letter may be proved in mitigation of damages.[47] In order to claim the benefit of facts tending to mitigate damages in such an action, defendant must plead and prove such facts.[48]

Under the particular facts an award of damages for failure to issue a service letter as required by statute has been regarded as excessive[49] or as not excessive.[50]

§ 45. Testimonials as to Character

An employer is not under a duty to give his employee a testimonial of character, a letter of recommendation, or a clearance card or letter, in the absence of statute, contract provision, or custom or usage imposing such duty.

At common law no duty is imposed on an employer to give his employee a testimonial of character, or a letter of recommendation or clearance card or letter on the severance of the relation in the absence of a contractual provision or a custom or usage requiring it.[51] A custom of certain types of employers to issue a letter of clearance to a discharged employee has been held to be an implied part of the contract of employment.[52]

Definitions, distinctions, and sufficiency

(1) "Clearance card" has been defined as a letter, good, bad, or indifferent, given to an employee at the time of his discharge or end of service showing the cause of such discharge or voluntary quittance, the length of time of service, his capacity, and such other facts as would give to those concerned information of his former employment.—Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Jenkins, 51 N.E. 811, 812, 174 Ill. 398, 402, 66 Am.S.R. 296, 62 L.R.A. 922—11 C.J. p 836 note 81.

(3) "Clearance card" has been distinguished from a "letter of recommendation."—Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Jenkins, supra—11 C.J. p 836 note 81 [b].

(4) "Letter of recommendation" has been defined as "a letter commending the former services of the holder, and speaking of him in such terms as would tend to bring such services to the favorable notice of those to whom he might apply for employment."—Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Jenkins, supra—36 C.J. p 993 note 93 [a].

(5) "The clearance card merely shows the date of entering the service of the employer, the capacities in which service was rendered, the date of leaving the employment, and the reason for the severance of relations between the employer and employee."—Adams v. Southern Pac. Co., 266 P. 541, 542, 204 Cal. 63, 57 A.L.R. 1066.

Discharge without recommendation

Store and assistant manager had right to discharge sales clerk without a recommendation.—Montgomery Ward & Co. v. Skinner, Miss., 25 So. 2d 572.

52. Ill.—Creitz v. Bennett, 273 Ill. App. 88.

charged employee or an employee leaving voluntarily from obtaining employment elsewhere has been regarded as valid.[53] The mere placing by the employer, on his own records, of the cause of a discharge does not come within the definition of "blacklisting" contemplated by such a statute.[54]

Under a statute authorizing an employer to give a truthful statement of the reason of discharge to one to whom the discharged employee has applied for employment, the employer may include the record of the employee,[55] but a statement outside of information requested, and not bearing on the character and competency of the employee, is not rendered proper by the fact that it is true.[56]

Actions. Where the master may suspend or discharge an employee at pleasure, with or without cause, the fact that the employee's reputation is affected by unfavorable inferences drawn from the suspension or discharge will not render the employer liable in damages,[57] and a discharged employee may not maintain an action for failure of the employer to furnish a clearance, in the absence of statutory provision, custom, or express agreement in that regard.[58] A discharged employee is not entitled to recover from his former employer for the latter's maintenance of a record showing the ground of discharge, where such record is in accordance with the facts and the ground stated justified discharge.[59] The view has been taken, however, that, where there is a custom among certain employers to keep a record of the causes of discharge of employees and for one employer not to employ persons discharged by another for certain causes, an employer may be liable to a discharged employee for making a false entry as to the cause of discharge if such entry results in the employee being denied employment by another.[60]

In the absence of statute or specific provision of the contract of employment requiring the issuance of a clearance card or letter of clearance to a discharged employee, in order to recover for failure to issue such a card or letter plaintiff employee must allege a duty on the part of the employer to issue such card or letter by reason of an alleged custom,[61] and, where the allegations of plaintiff's pleading shows that the duty to issue a letter of clearance arises only when the employee's record justifies issuance, such pleadings should contain allegations showing that such duty had arisen.[62] According to some cases, in order to entitle a discharged employee to recover from the employer for making a false entry as to the cause of discharge, it is essential for the employee to allege that he has sought employment and that employment has been refused because of such entry.[63] In an action for failure of the employer to give a clearance card in accordance with an alleged usage or custom, the burden is on plaintiff to prove the existence of such usage or custom.[64]

§ 46. Operation and Effect of Discharge

A servant who has been discharged must depart peaceably and must vacate premises occupied by him as an incident of the employment. A discharge which constitutes a breach of the employment contract renders the employer subject to the consequences of such a breach.

On his discharge, a servant must leave peaceably whether or not the discharge was rightful,[65] and vacate the house or premises occupied by him as servant.[66] If the servant fails to leave peaceably, or after doing so returns, he becomes a trespasser, and may be ejected by the master,[67] even though his wages may not all have been paid.[68] So, also, where a person is occupying premises as an incident of an employment, and not as a tenant, and the employment has terminated, his goods may be removed with such force as is necessary.[69]

As a general rule, a discharge becomes effective on the date of formal notice of immediate discharge.[70]

A discharge which constitutes a breach of the contract of employment renders the employer subject to the consequences of such breach.[71] In the absence of statutory or contractual requirement, private contracts of employment usually do not carry with them the right to compel the employer to reinstate the employee if the discharge is wrongful.[72]

The performance of subsidiary contract is not excused by notice of the termination of the contract of employment, when the notice given is not to take effect immediately.[73] It has been held, however, that, where the employee has wrongfully been discharged and the contract of employment is entire and inseparable, the employee is not bound by an agreement in the contract not to solicit customers of the employer within a specified time after termination of the contract.[74]

Under a contract allowing cancellation by giving a stipulated notice in writing, a discharge is equivalent to such notice as fixing the amount that can thereafter be recovered.[75]

§ 47. Actions for Wrongful Discharge

The right of action by an employee against his employer for a wrongful discharge and the nature and form of the remedy are considered infra §§ 48–59. Actions for breach of employment contracts generally are discussed supra § 11. Actions for wages are considered infra §§ 122–137, and the remedies of an employee for the malicious procurement of his discharge infra §§ 631, 632.

§ 48. —— Right of Action

a. In general

b. Conditions precedent

a. In General

As a general rule no right of action arises in favor of an employee on his discharge unless he has been hired for a definite term. The wrongfulness of the discharge determines the right of action where the hiring is for a definite term.

Since a right of action for a wrongful discharge is based or founded on contract, a contract mutually binding on the parties is necessary before such a right of action can arise.[76] As a general rule, unless the contract of employment is for some definite time, the servant has no right of action, on be-

Right to possession

On termination of the employment, generally the right to possession of premises which have been occupied by the servant as living or residential quarters as an incident to the employment is in the master.

76. Ky.—Clark v. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. Ry. Co., 79 S.W.2d 704, 706, 258 Ky. 197.

"In order to sustain a claim for damages for the wrongful discharge of an employee, it should be made to appear that a valid contract for such employment . . . existed at the time of his discharge. It should be shown that such contract was entered into for a definite period of time; and likewise should show obligation on the part of the employee to render service for a fixed period and a reciprocal obligation on the employer's part to retain such services."—Clark v. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. Ry. Co., supra.

Obligation of employee

An obligation on the employee to render services for the period of employment is implied under a contract otherwise showing mutuality as to consideration.—Perfection Mattress & Spring Co. v. Dupree, 113 So. 74, 216 Ala. 303.

ing discharged,[77] for breach of contract[78] if he has been paid his salary for the time actually employed.[79] If employed for a definite time, the servant's right of action is dependent on the wrongfulness of the discharge[80] and the monetary loss resulting therefrom.[81] Where a servant, at the time of his discharge, has received more than the contract compensation for the term, he cannot maintain an action for breach of contract because he is not permitted to serve the full term.[82]

No right of action arises where the employee is discharged under the terms of the contract.[83] On the other hand, where a contract for an otherwise indefinite term provides for a certain method of procedure as a condition precedent to discharge, a discharge without such procedure is a breach of the contract entitling the servant to a right of action.[84]

Wrongful discharge as giving rise to action in contract or tort is discussed in Actions § 49 e (8).

"Sanctioning right" is the right of a servant who is wrongfully discharged to recover damages from the master for a breach of contract.[85]

b. Conditions Precedent

An actual offer to perform, or a demand for, work is not a condition precedent to an action for wrongful discharge, at least where the discharge has been clearly indicated.

A formal discharge need not be shown in order to maintain an action for wrongful discharge, since it is sufficient that the employer has by word or conduct plainly evinced an intention not to perform.[86] Tender of performance by the employee of a condition of the contract as to which he is not in default at the time of the institution of the action is not a condition precedent to the maintenance of the action.[87] While it has been held that in an action for wrongful discharge the servant must show his readiness and willingness to carry out the contract,[88] generally an actual offer to perform or a demand for work is unnecessary, at least where the discharge has been clearly indicated.[89] Where,

In Louisiana
(1) Where, under the statute, the whole amount of salary for the term becomes due and demandable on a wrongful discharge, it is unnecessary for the employee to tender his services or put the employer in default.—Van Denburgh v. H. T. Higginbotham, Inc., 122 So. 581, 168 La. 461—Dunbar v. Orleans Metal Bed Co., 82 So. 889, 145 La. 779.

however, a clear unequivocal act of dismissal has not been established, there must be some affirmative act on the part of the servant to show a tender of service.[90] Thus a discharge by a superior whose authority is not shown will not justify the neglect of the servant, whose contract was directly with the employer, to tender his services directly to him,[91] but where the servant is discharged by a duly authorized agent he is not required to seek the employer and demand a continuance in his employ.[92]

In an action for breach of contract to give permanent employment, the servant need not tender a return of the amount paid him before the breach when there is no dispute as to his right thereto and a tender would be an idle ceremony.[93] In an action for breach of such a contract, the consideration for which is the release of a claim for injuries, the employee must have actually performed his part of the agreement by actually releasing his claim,[94] but it is unnecessary for him to have returned or tendered a cash amount received in part consideration of such waiver.[95]

A contract requiring a servant to return all records to the employer as a prerequisite to a final settlement at the termination of the contract does not make such return a condition precedent to the bringing of an action for breach of contract.[96]

A statute requiring notice of an injury is not applicable to actions for a breach of contract by wrongful discharge.[97]

§ 49. —— Accrual of Right

a. In general

b. Under constructive service doctrine

a. In General

A right of action for wrongful discharge usually arises on the discharge.

The right of action for a wrongful discharge of an employee before expiration of the contract term generally arises on the discharge, and ordinarily the action may be brought immediately thereafter where recovery of the value of services performed is sought.[98] If damages for breach of contract are sought, the action may be brought immediately after the discharge, or at any time during, or at the expiration of, the term,[99] unless the damages cannot be ascertained until after expiration of the term, in which case the action cannot be brought until such expiration.[1] An action brought before an actual breach of the contract is premature.[2]

Limitations. The action must be instituted within the time limited by the statute of limitations.[3]

Under statute. Under the statutes of some states, the whole amount of the salary under a contract of

Bonus payable at specific time

Limitations begin to run against an action for breach of a contract of employment by wrongful discharge from the time of the wrongful discharge, and not from the time when the employee elects to treat the contract as terminated.—Pennsylvania Co. v. Good, 103 N.E. 672, 56 Ind.App. 562.

employment for a certain time becomes due and demandable on a wrongful discharge, and may be sued for immediately.[4] Such a statute has been held not to give an employee a cause of action for salary where he never was allowed to enter into the service of the employer.[5] Where the amount of salary is indefinite and to be governed by events, action must be postponed until it can be ascertained with legal certainty.[6]

b. Under Constructive Service Doctrine

As a general rule an action for wages for the period following the discharge, under the constructive service doctrine, cannot be instituted until expiration of the term.

In those jurisdictions in which the doctrine of constructive service obtains, as discussed infra § 50, an action for wages accruing after the discharge cannot be brought until the expiration of the term[7] unless the contract is divisible, in which case an action may be brought for each installment as it falls due.[8]

§ 50. —— Nature and Form of Remedy

a. In general
b. Action for wages
c. Action on quantum meruit
d. Action for breach of contract

a. In General

A choice of several remedies is available to an employee wrongfully discharged before expiration of the contract term.

On wrongful discharge of an employee before the end of the contract term a choice of several remedies is available to the employee.[9] These remedies are considered in detail in the other subdivisions of this section.

As discussed in Actions § 49 e (8), the action available to an employee wrongfully discharged is in contract, not in tort, unless the discharge be accompanied by other wrongful conduct amounting to a tort.

b. Action for Wages

An employee wrongfully discharged before expiration of the contract term may bring an action for wages due for the services rendered prior to the time of the discharge. Except where the constructive service doctrine is followed, an action for wages for the unexpired term does not lie.

One employed to serve for a certain time, and subsequently discharged for no fault of his own before the expiration of the term, may recover by action the wages due prior to the time of the discharge,[10] as well as damages for the breach of the contract with respect to the unexpired term, as discussed infra subdivision d of this section. It has been held that a servant discharged during the period between salary payments cannot recover compensation for that part of the period for which he worked, his only claim being for damages for breach of contract.[11] Where wages cannot be recovered in an action for breach of contract unless a count therefor is contained in the complaint, as discussed infra § 52, a judgment in an action simply for breach of contract does not operate as a bar to a subsequent action for such wages.[12]

Wages for unexpired term. Under the constructive service doctrine,[13] which has been followed in some decisions,[14] an action may be brought to recover the stipulated wages for the unexpired term.[15]

13. Doctrine explained
The constructive service doctrine is the doctrine of the law of master and servant that a discharged employee holding himself ready to do the work has therefore done the work, and that readiness is, for all purposes, equivalent to performance. —James v. Allen County, 6 N.E. 246, 44 Ohio St. 226, 58 Am.R. 821.

15. Ala.—Standard Oil Co. v. Lloyd, 159 So. 371, 26 Ala.App. 306.
39 C.J. p 93 note 34.

Where, however, this doctrine is followed, it has been held that a discharged employee has the alternative right of bringing suit at once for damages for the entire unexpired term.[16]

This doctrine has been expressly repudiated in some jurisdictions.[17] These authorities hold that, if a servant is wrongfully discharged, he has no action for wages except for services past rendered,[18] and his remedy with respect to the unexpired term is an action for damages sustained by reason of his discharge, in not being allowed to serve and earn the wages agreed on, as discussed infra subdivision d of this section.

c. Action on Quantum Meruit

Where a servant is discharged after partial performance without just cause, he may sue for the value of the services performed on a quantum meruit.

Where a servant is discharged after partial performance without just cause, he may treat the contract as rescinded and sue for the value of the services performed on a quantum meruit.[19] Such an action precludes a subsequent action for breach of contract, as it is not permissible to split up a single cause of action into two or more suits.[20]

d. Action for Breach of Contract

An employee who has been wrongfully discharged in breach of contract may maintain an action for damages caused by such breach.

Instead of treating the contract as rescinded and suing on a quantum merit, a servant who has been wrongfully discharged may treat the contract as continuing, notwithstanding its breach by the master, and sue for damages for the wrongful discharge,[21] and this is generally the only remedy available to the employee with respect to the unexpired part of the contract term during which he was not permitted to render service to the employer.[22] Although earnings of the employee after

Common counts

If employee had contract for services to be performed and was discharged without fault on his part, fact that he held himself in readiness to perform is tantamount to full performance, leaving nothing to be done on either part, save payment of stipulated wage, and entitles employee to recover on common count.—Ex parte Towle, 106 So. 60, 213 Ala. 129.

Special assumpsit for the next installment of salary due under the contract lies where, on the wrongful termination of an employment contract by the employer after the expiration of but part of the term fixed, the employee remained ready, able, and willing to perform.—Bowden v. Board of Education of School Dist. No. 41, Du Page County, 264 Ill.App. 1.

his wrongful discharge go to mitigate the damages recoverable by him, as discussed infra § 59, the acceptance of new employment by the employee for the unexpired term of service is not, as a general rule, a waiver of his claim or right of action for damages.[23]

Where the employer's breach of the employment contract is the equivalent of a termination thereof so that the breach goes to the entire contract, but a single cause of action for damages arises therefrom.[24] Hence, where an action has been brought for damages, no further action may be brought on a quantum meruit,[25] nor may another action be brought for breach of the contract.[26] Where plaintiff has recovered in an action, although by confession, a sum partly earned and partly not earned, the recovery will be treated as having been obtained in a suit for breach of contract, and a further suit will be barred.[27]

Although an action on a quantum meruit is inconsistent with, and a bar to, a subsequent action for breach of contract, as discussed supra subdivision c of this section, where an employee, not having elected to treat the contract as rescinded, sues on the contract for wages and expenses due him up to the time of dismissal, such an action is not inconsistent with, or a bar to, a subsequent action for breach of contract.[28]

§ 51. —— Defenses

A sufficient cause for the discharge of a servant constitutes a defense to an action for wrongful discharge.

As a general rule a sufficient cause for the discharge of a servant, although not the inducing motive to the discharge, or even known to the master, constitutes a defense to an action for wrongful discharge.[29] Where the contract provides for its termination by written notice specifying the cause, a cause not specified in the notice has been held not to be available as a defense,[30] and it has also been held that a cause arising subsequently to the discharge may not be urged in defense.[31]

While a master does not have the right of recall of a discharge at any time and under all circumstances under pain of a forfeiture by the servant of his right of recovery,[32] a servant is not required to accept a suggestion of return when further association between the parties would be unprofitable to both and degrading to him.[33] It has been held, however, that a master may defend an action for wrongful discharge by showing that the discharge was by mistake, and that as soon as the mistake was discovered, and before the servant had sustained any damages, he offered to revoke, and insisted on revoking, the discharge.[34]

An employer is relieved of liability by showing a threatened resignation unless an improper demand is granted,[35] a voluntary resignation before,[36] or subsequent to,[37] the discharge, or even a resignation tendered only for the sake of appearances, and at the employer's request;[38] but a resignation on a condition not accepted by the employer will not be a defense to a subsequent discharge.[39] Likewise a master may show, in defense, a reconciliation and return to service,[40] and he may show by way of recoupment any loss of custom or other injury caused by the servant's conduct.[41]

It is not a complete defense to such an action, however, that the servant has had, or, by the exercise of reasonable diligence, might have had, other employment,[42] whatever might be its effect as reducing damages, as discussed infra § 59; that the servant has rejected the master's offer to continue him in his service at a reduced rate;[43] that the servant has accepted employment by the master in another capacity;[44] that the servant has engaged in business for himself in competition with his master;[45] that after his discharge the servant has taken away customers, originally brought by him to his master under the terms of his contract, and carried them to his new employers;[46] that the servant, after his discharge, applied for and obtained a letter of recommendation, where he notifies the master that he claims under, and intends to enforce, his contract;[47] that the servant failed to assert the contract of employment at the time of discharge;[48] or that the master is insolvent and unable to continue his business.[49] It is no defense to an action for wrongful discharge that the operation of the business in which plaintiff was employed was unprofitable[50] unless it is shown that the loss was due to the fault of the servant.[51]

A discharge must be treated as such,[52] and, if ignored, a continuing in employment defeats any right of action;[53] but the fact that the contract is not entirely rescinded by the servant who continues in the employ does not prohibit his recovery for the loss sustained by a partial breach.[54]

Under a statute rendering an employer liable for wages for the unexpired term of a contract of employment on wrongful discharge, the fact that the employee so discharged remained in the employment during the period of notice of the discharge is not an acquiescence therein so as to relieve the employer of liability.[55]

action ex contractu,[57] and, where a complaint alleges facts sufficient to constitute such a cause of action, the fact that the prayer is for a judgment for wages instead of for damages does not render it fatally defective.[58] In some decisions it has been held that a servant suing for damages for a wrongful discharge must declare specially, and the common counts are not sufficient,[59] and that, where plaintiff sues on the common count in assumpsit, without inserting a count upon a special contract, he can recover only for the time he has actually served.[60] It has also been held that wages due cannot be recovered in an action for breach of contract, unless a count therefor is contained in the declaration.[61]

In an action in tort for a wrongful discharge the complaint should state facts sufficient to show a legal duty other than that growing out of the contract of employment and a violation thereof resulting in injury to the employee.[62]

Time of issuing writ or filing declaration. The fact that a declaration alleges that the term of service has expired, without making any reference to the time when it was filed, or to the issuance of the writ, cannot prejudice the finding of the jury, where the proof is ample to show a good cause of action as stated by plaintiff.[63]

Joinder of counts. When each of two counts, substantially the same, states a good cause of action, the objection of redundancy cannot be reached by demurrer, since it would be unjust to dismiss the petition because the same good cause of action is stated in two distinct counts.[64] Where a servant, on his discharge, before the expiration of the term, in an action on the contract, files the common counts only, he may amend by filing a special count founded on the breach of the contract.[65]

Complaint under Federal Rules of Civil Procedure

In employee's action against employer for breach of employment contract, complaint stating existence of an employment contract and discharge without cause, and alleging that plaintiff was entitled to damages in an amount representing balance of plaintiff's unpaid salary under contract amount of which was a specified sum, was sufficient under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.—Stinson v. Written contract

Petition alleging a written contract for one year's employment as evidenced by correspondence between parties which was filed as exhibits with the petition, some of which exhibits referred to the employment as having a year's duration, stated a cause of action for breach of contract by discharge without cause before expiration of the year, although some of the exhibits referred to employment as being by the month.—Hamilton Carin tort and lacking the requisite contract allegations is insufficient and demurrable.[67]

Period of hiring. In an action for damages for breach of an employment contract by wrongful discharge, it has been held that the complaint must allege a hiring for a specific term.[68] If the employee claims an employment for a term, the duration of which was to extend as long as his services were satisfactory, he should frame his pleading to conform to such theory.[69]

Wrongful discharge. In an action for damages for breach of contract by wrongful discharge, the wrongful discharge must be averred as the breach of the contract and as the fact constituting the cause of action.[70] However, the ground on which the discharge was actually made need not be specifically alleged,[71] and it has been held that a specific averment that the discharge was without cause is unnecessary since a discharge before termination of the contract period is prima facie a violation of the agreement.[72] A formal dismissal need not be alleged or proved; an allegation of the denial and repudiation of the contract is sufficient.[73] An allegation that defendant refused to permit plaintiff to perform services,[74] although coupled with an allegation that defendant refused to pay plaintiff under the contract,[75] is insufficient to charge a discharge in an action for breach of contract, although sufficient in an action for money due for services rendered.[76] However, a complaint alleging a hiring for a term, a notice by the employer of cancellation of the contract, and a refusal by him to permit the employee to continue his performance of the contract, plus an allegation of damage, has been held to state a cause of action for breach of contract.[77]

Where the contract gives the employer a right to discharge the employee under certain circumstances, an allegation that the employer breached the contract by discharging the employee without provocation on his part is not sufficient.[78] Where, however, the contract of employment permits the Complaint alleging employer's wrongful discharge of employee in public, which did not allege the making of an employment contract and did not show terms of contract fixing the employee's rights and the employer's liability, was construable as purporting to allege cause of action in tort for wrongful discharge and not cause of action for wrongful breach of employment contract, notwithstanding allegation that employee had been in constant employment of the defendant for nearly seven years.—May v. Race as ground for discharge

In action for breach of employment contract, complaint alleging that plaintiff was discharged on sole ground that he was a Jew was held sufficient to state cause of action.—Holzer v. Deutsche Reichsbahn Gesellschaft, 290 N.Y.S. 181, 159 Misc. 830.

Sufficiency of allegation

(1) Allegation in action for breach of employment contract that plaintiff was discharged without any cause whatsoever is a sufficient allegation of wrongful discharge, in absence of demurrer.—Wood v. Girot, 282 P. 981, 102 Cal.App. 160.

(2) Complaint is sufficient on demurrer where it alleges that plaintiff was discharged "without any reasonable cause whatever."—Foley v. Mail & Express Pub. Co., 28 N.Y. S. 778, 8 Misc. 91.

Discharge in violation of statute

A complaint, seeking to recover damages from corporate employer for alleged wrongful discharge on ground that employer's action in refusing plaintiff's request for a leave of absence, in order to conduct a campaign in his own behalf for nomination to a state office, constituted a violation of statute making it unlawful for corporation to restrain political activities of its employees, which failed to allege that employer's action did interfere with plaintiff's political action, or that plaintiff ever did decide to or ever did run for any nomination, was insufficient.—Coxon v. 78. Fla.—Hazen v. Cobb, 117 So. 853, 96 Fla. 151.

Reason for rule

The discharge complained of may discharge of the employee when his services are unsatisfactory, it is only necessary to allege that the employee's services were not unsatisfactory in fact, and that the employer's assignment of such ground for the discharge was false and made in bad faith.[79]

In an action for damages for wrongful discharge, the precise date of the discharge need not be alleged, as in such a case time is not of the essence of the claim.[80]

Performance or readiness and willingness to perform. Where, under the statutory form, an allegation that an employee "duly" performed the contract is sufficient in an action for wages earned, an allegation that plaintiff "fully" performed is insufficient.[81] An allegation of performance by the employee is unnecessary, however, in an action for damages for breach of contract, as the cause of action is not predicated on performance, but on defendant's prevention of performance.[82] So when a servant, in an action for breach of contract of hiring, counts on breach alone, not attempting to recover on the contract as such, an averment of readiness and willingness to perform is unnecessary.[83]

Nonpayment. Where the declaration in an action for wrongful discharge claims damages in a specified amount, it need not contain an averment that the employee was not paid for the services rendered, since the claim for damages is a sufficient allegation of that fact.[84] In an action for damages for breach of contract, however, it has been held that compensation for services rendered under the contract is not recoverable in the absence of allegations showing the amount due and unpaid.[85]

Negativing defenses. The declaration, petition, or complaint in an action for wrongful discharge need not negative matters of defense,[86] as, for example, matters which might be available to the employer in mitigation of damages.[87] Thus the employee need not allege his inability to obtain employment or to earn anything.[88] In some jurisdictions, however, in order to recover more than nominal damages, the employee must allege that he exercised reasonable diligence in seeking other employment and that he failed to find other employment, or, if he found other employment, that it did not pay as much as he would have received for like services under the contract.[89]

Damages. In an action for damages for breach of contract by wrongful discharge, appropriate allegations with respect to the damages sustained by the employee by reason of his wrongful discharge should be sufficiently set forth in the complaint.[90] Elements of special damage which are not pleaded cannot be allowed or submitted to the jury.[91]

Where punitive damages are recoverable in an action for breach of a contract of employment by wrongful discharge, as discussed infra § 58, in order to entitle the employee to such damages the complaint must contain such allegations as show his right thereto.[92]

b. Plea or Answer

The general rules of pleading in civil actions apply with respect to the plea or answer in an action for wrongful discharge.

The general rules of pleading in civil actions apply with respect to the plea or answer of the employer in an action instituted by an employee for wrongful discharge.[93] Accordingly, under the provisions of the codes and practice acts, inconsistent defenses may be relied on.[94] It has been held that a written release from liability for damages executed by the employee must be specially pleaded by the employer in order to be available as a defense.[95]

An affidavit of defense alleging that the employee voluntarily left defendant's employ is sufficient to prevent a judgment on the pleadings.[96]

Where recovery of damages for breach of contract is sought and defendant files an affidavit of merits denying such contract, he cannot defend on a different ground without asking leave and filing an amended affidavit.[97] The employer should be permitted to amend his pleadings so as to set up matters in justification, if such matters are not otherwise pleaded.[98]

Where the defense to an action for wrongful discharge is misconduct generally, plaintiff is entitled to an order for particulars, showing the nature and character of the instances relied on by the master, and setting forth the dates and substantial facts and circumstances of all the instances and occasions wherein and whereon plaintiff misconducted himself on which defendant intends to rely.[99] Such particulars may be demanded with respect to an allegation in defendant's answer, although such allegations were unnecessary.[1] Even where justification is not a special defense which must be specially pleaded, the employer may be compelled to specify the ground or grounds of complaint or cause or causes of the discharge if the employee should require such particulars.[2]

Matters in justification. Although there is some authority to the contrary,[3] as a general rule, if justification for the discharge is relied on by the employer as a defense to an action for wrongful discharge, the defense must be specifically pleaded.[4] In order to be sufficient a plea of justification must set forth such facts as will constitute a defense to the action.[5] The mere denial of a wrongful discharge without an allegation of facts justifying it is not sufficient.[6] The employer, however, is only required to plead as a defense such grounds of jus-

Conduct after discharge

A plea alleging conduct of the employee after his discharge as a cause for such discharge was held insufficient.—Perfection Mattress & Spring Co. v. Dupree, supra.

Setting up competitive business

(1) A plea alleging as ground for discharge of an employee the contemplated establishment of a competitive business by employees was held insufficient as a plea in justification where it failed to allege the knowledge or consent of the discharged employee of the activities of other employees, or how or in what manner the conduct of the employee was legally prejudicial to the employer.—Perfection Mattress & Spring Co. v. Dupree, supra.

(2) A plea that the employee set up a competitive business was also held bad where it failed to allege that the discharged employee organized such business during the term of his employment.—Perfection Mattress & Spring Co. v. Dupree, supra.

tification as are not raised by a mere denial of the allegations in the complaint.[7] Accordingly, where by the terms of a statute plaintiff is compelled to allege that the discharge was without good reason, justification need not be specially pleaded.[8] Allegations in the answer that plaintiff made certain representations as to skill at the time of hiring are properly stricken out when there is no allegation that such representations are false.[9]

Matters in mitigation of damages. The burden is on the employer to plead the facts which he asserts will minimize the damages claimed by the employee.[10] Accordingly the fact that the servant earned or could, by the exercise of reasonable diligence, have earned a certain amount after his discharge must be pleaded specially in mitigation of damages.[11] When such matters are set up as a plea in bar of the entire action and not in mitigation of damages, the plea is demurrable.[12] It is not enough to plead merely that plaintiff made no effort to obtain work, but it must also be alleged that he might have obtained work by the exercise of reasonable diligence, unless the circumstances are such that the latter fact must be presumed.[13]

c. Issues, Proof, and Variance

In an action by a servant for wrongful discharge the issues are confined to those raised by the pleadings, the proof is restricted to the issues, and there must not be a material variance between the pleading and proof.

In an action for damages for breach of contract by wrongful discharge, only such matters may be considered, or relied on by the parties, as are put in issue by the pleadings and supported by the evidence.[14] Hence, when an employer attempts to justify discharge on a particular ground, he is restricted to the ground specified, and no other reasons for the discharge may be invoked.[15] Where a master discharges a servant for breach of duty, the issuable fact is not whether there was a breach of duty, but whether there was such a breach as constituted reasonable ground for terminating the contract.[16] Where an employer sued for a wrongful discharge withdraws a plea of discharge for cause and pleads abandonment of the employment by the employee, the issue of the rightfulness of the discharge is no longer in the case.[17] In a suit by a servant for a wrongful discharge, on a contract in writing set out in the declaration in hæc verba, an unverified plea of the general issue does not put in issue the making of the contract by the master, where by statute the general issue must be verified in order to have the effect of putting the making of the contract sued on in issue.[18]

In an action of this character, only such elements of damages as are warranted by the pleadings and proof are recoverable.[19]

Evidence admissible under pleadings. In an action for breach of contract by wrongful discharge, evidence conforming to the pleadings and the issues raised thereby, and only such evidence, is admissible.[20] Facts which would constitute an affirmative defense cannot avail defendant when they appear in the record over the objection of plaintiff and the defense was not pleaded.[21]

Matters in justification ordinarily are inadmissible under a general denial,[22] although there is also

Time of discharge

Complaint alleging that discharge took place during the week of a specified date permits proof that discharge took effect several days after the specified date.—Kuna v. Superior Fur Dyeing Corporation, 1 N.Y.S.2d 985, 253 App.Div. 342, appeal denied 14 N.E.2d 214, 278 N.Y. 737.

authority to the contrary.[23] Under a general denial, however, the employer may show conduct on the part of the employee amounting to a breach, when the latter has alleged performance on his part,[24] and, since under such an answer the employer may offer any evidence tending to disprove the contract as alleged, he may show a different contract which authorized a discharge.[25] Where the contract provided that the services of the servant were to be to the satisfaction of the master, under a general denial defendant may show that the services were unsatisfactory.[26] A general denial is also broad enough to include proof of voluntary resignation.[27] When justification is set up by the pleadings, evidence will be limited to the specific ground of justification alleged.[28]

A denial of the making of the alleged contract, without affirmatively pleading another contract, raises an issue which is met by evidence that the employment was for an indefinite time, instead of a fixed period.[29] Where plaintiff alleges performance, which defendant denies, the former may properly show that acts first disclosed during the trial and relied on by defendant as constituting a breach by plaintiff were authorized by a superior.[30]

All damages necessarily resulting from the breach of the contract may be proved, under a general allegation of damages, as general damages.[31] Where, however, the declaration contains no allegation of malice or of special damage beyond the loss of position and wages, evidence of special damage by loss of character is inadmissible.[32] The fact that the employee found employment elsewhere, or declined an offer of similar employment, or by due diligence might have found similar employment, has been held provable, although not specially pleaded, on the ground that it disproves actual damage and does not constitute a mitigating circumstance which must be pleaded to be available as a defense.[33] Also, where the complaint alleges that plaintiff, since the dismissal, has been unable to obtain steady or profitable employment, evidence as to his earnings in the meantime is admissible under a general denial.[34]

Variance. In an action for wrongful discharge there must not be a material variance between the pleadings and the proof,[35] although a slight variation is not fatal.[36] A variance is not established by proof of a modification of the contract declared on.[37] In order to recover for breach of contract, the employee must prove the contract as pleaded.[38] Hence, where plaintiff sues on an alleged contract

Failure to object

Where evidence of justification for the discharge of a servant is received without objection, it should be submitted to the jury, although not specially pleaded.—Farquhar v. to employ him for life, he cannot recover on proving a hiring for any shorter period than for life.[39] Also, where the employee declares on a special contract and undertakes to prove it, he cannot, at the same time, offer proof of the value of his services, and recover on a quantum meruit, where the employer has denied the making of any contract at all.[40] In the absence of allegations authorizing recovery on a quantum meruit the employee cannot recover on the entire contract by proof of part performance.[41] Since it is the duty of a wrongfully discharged servant to earn what he can after his discharge, an averment of readiness and willingness to perform subsequent to the discharge is not materially variant from proof of efforts to find employment,[42] or even from proof that he did find it.[43] Money expended to the use of defendant cannot be recovered in an action alleging a breach of contract of employment, since that is a cause of action distinct from that set forth in the complaint.[44]

a. Presumptions and Burden of Proof

(1) In general
(2) Matters of justification
(3) Damages

(1) In General

As a general rule the burden of proof in actions for wrongful discharge is on the party holding the affirmative of the issue.

In accordance with the general rules of evidence in civil actions, the burden of proof in actions for wrongful discharge is on the party holding the affirmative of the issue.[45] In the first instance, the burden is on plaintiff to prove his contract and its performance up to the time of discharge[46] as well as the employer's breach thereof,[47] and, where the contract of hiring is indefinite, the burden of showing the hiring to have been for a certain term rests on the employee.[48] The burden of showing ability and willingness to perform the contract is on the employee.[49] The employee establishes a prima facie case, however, by proving the contract, his performance thereof up to the time of his discharge, and the damage resulting from the discharge.[50] Where the employer interposes a defense that plaintiff consented to a cancellation of the contract, the burden is on defendant to prove such consent.[51] The fact that an employee becomes ill after discharge furnishes no presumption that such illness would have arisen if he continued in employment, so as to have justified suspension of payment on the part of the employer.[52]

(2) Matters of Justification

The burden of proving just cause for the discharge generally rests on the employer.

Although there is some authority to the contrary,[53] as a general rule, where a servant enters on his duties and continues until he is dismissed, he

Statement of rule
The burden of proof in the sense of establishing by a preponderance of evidence that he has faithfully performed his contract and defendant has broken it rests on plaintiff. This burden does not shift. Plaintiff has prima facie sustained his need not prove that he performed his services faithfully, as a presumption arises that such is the fact,[54] and the burden of proving a sufficient cause for his discharge is on the master,[55] and this burden does not shift to the employee by reason of an allegation in his complaint that he was dismissed without good cause.[56] The general rule, however, is inapplicable when the liability imposed by contract is conditional, and performance of it must be averred and proved or want of performance excused.[57] Accordingly, where the contract calls for performance of the employee's duties in a manner satisfactory to the employer, the burden is on the employee to prove that his services were in fact satisfactory to the employer and that the latter's expression of dissatisfaction as a ground for the discharge was fraudulent and in bad faith.[58]

(3) Damages

As a general rule the burden of proving the damages sustained by reason of a wrongful discharge is on the employee, but the burden of proving matters in mitigation of damages rests on the employer.

As a general rule the burden of proving the damages sustained by reason of a wrongful discharge is on the employee.[59] Where the contract of employment provides for compensation on a commission basis, the employee has the burden of proving his probable earnings and the expenses to which he would have been put in performing the contract.[60] The fact that he is also on a drawing account creates no presumption that the commissions would have covered his expenses as well as drawings.[61] Where the employment contract permits the em-burden when he testifies generally to faithful performance and the employer's breach. The duty of going forward with evidence of mismanagement or misconduct or unfaithfulness is then shifted to defendant, if he would not have such prima facie case result in an established case by the required weight of evidence. At the close of the testimony, however, if the evidence is evenly balanced, plaintiff has failed to establish his case, and the verdict must be for defendant.—Schafer v. Thurston Mfg. Co., supra.

It cannot be presumed from the fact of discharge that the employee failed to perform his duties in compliance with the employment contract.—Hansen v. Columbia Breweries, 122 P.2d 489, 12 Wash.2d 554.

Failure to prove faithful performance by employee does not justify direction of verdict for employer, since it is incumbent on employer to plead and prove just cause for the dismissal.—Williams v. Leaf Tobacco Co., 168 S.W.2d 570, 293 Ky. 270.

Burden of going forward

Proof of valid employment contract and discharge of employee imposes burden on employer of coming forward with evidence that employee was discharged because of dissatisfaction, but burden of proof on whole case is on plaintiff employee, and he must show that dissatisfaction was not genuine.—Zitlin v. Max Heit Dress Corporation, 271 N.Y.S. 275, 151 Misc. 241.

Insufficient showing

In action by salesman for unlawful discharge by employer, salesman's statement that had he been permitted to continue for balance of term of employment he would have earned commissions netting him at least amount of weekly drawing account allowed him by employer, was insufficient to establish that fact.—Preager v. Unity Shoemakers Corporation, 15 N.Y.S.2d 45, 257 App. Div. 632.

ployee to do outside work which does not interfere with the employer's requirements, the employee makes out a prima facie case with respect to damages by proving the agreed wage.[62]

Matters in mitigation of damages. As discussed infra § 58, the measure of damages for a breach of contract by wrongful discharge is prima facie the sum stipulated to be paid for the services, and after proof of the stipulated wage the burden generally rests on the employer to prove that the damages were less.[63] Accordingly the burden of reducing the damages by proof that the servant has or might, with reasonable diligence, have obtained other remunerative employment rests on the employer.[64]

b. Admissibility

After proof of other employment

(1) It has been held that failure of employee to show wages received from other employment precludes recovery.—Hume v. Miller Hatcheries, Mo.App., 51 S.W.2d 179.

(2) It has also been held, in action for wrongful discharge from employment, that verdict for the amount due under contract for the unexpired term should be reduced by amounts which employee specifically testified that he received during the unexpired term, but not by virtue of other employment during such term, in absence of testimony concerning compensation received therefor.—Van Wyck v. Mannino, 9 N.Y.S.2d 684, 256 App.Div. 256, reargument denied 11 N.Y.S.2d 558, 256 App.Div. 1004.

Examination before trial

Employer, sued for wrongful discharge, was held entitled to examine employee before trial, as to earnings after discharge, because such earnings are an essential part of the employer's case.—Abramson v. Mrs. J. Davis Gowns, Inc., 219 N.Y.S. 137, 128 Misc. 454.

Reasonable diligence

In at least one jurisdiction, however, the burden is on the employee to prove that he exercised reasonable diligence in attempting to find new employment and his inability to earn anything, if such was the case, or if otherwise, what he earned or could have during the period.—Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Wells, 160 S.W.2d 16, 289 Ky. 700—Newport Dairy v. Shackelford, 88 S.W.2d 940, 261 Ky. 754—Torson Const. Co. v. Grant, 66 S.W.2d 79, 251 Ky. 800—39 C.J. p 102 note 69 [a].

erwise competent tending to establish his cause of action is admissible on behalf of the employee;[66] and, where the employer justifies, the employee may introduce any competent evidence in rebuttal of the defense[67] or bearing on the improbability of a discharge without probable cause.[68] Where the competency of the employee is in issue, a promise of a recommendation from the employer is admissible in evidence in rebuttal,[69] although rebutting proof need not be limited to work done for the employer, and the employee may show that his work for others, in a similar capacity, was satisfactory,[70] or he may show generally by witnesses knowing his qualifications that he was capable of performing the work satisfactorily.[71] Where the real issue in the case is the existence of cause for the discharge, evidence of motive for the discharge is inadmissible as beclouding the issue.[72]

Evidence of breach. In an action for wrongful discharge, the employer has the right to introduce any competent evidence tending to show a breach of any express or implied condition of the contract of employment by the employee,[73] provided, as discussed supra § 52 c, the proof is limited to the reason for the discharge set forth in his plea or answer as a justification. It has been held, however, that evidence of neglect of duty is admissible, although in the letter of dismissal another ground was assigned.[74] Evidence of similar conduct of the employee under a prior contract resulting in a discharge followed by condonation has been held properly rejected as without probative value on the issue of whether the employer had cause for the discharge.[75] Statements of an employee at the time of his discharge that he had already secured another position are competent as an admission against interest and relevant as tending to show that plaintiff left defendant's employ rather than that he was discharged.[76]

(2) Damages

Competent evidence relevant to the issue of damages is admissible in actions for damages for breach of contract by wrongful discharge.

Only competent evidence which is relevant to the issue may be admitted to prove damages in an action for wrongful discharge.[77] In such an action the original contract is admissible in evidence as showing the value of the services rendered,[78] and all relevant facts transpiring during the employment[79] or subsequent to the discharge[80] may be considered in estimating damages. Where the employee is engaged to perform services in another

77. Earnings in prior employment

In an action to recover damages for wrongful discharge, evidence of the employee's prior earnings with another employer in the same business is inadmissible to show the commissions he would have earned in the absence of a showing that the terms of the contracts were identical.—King v. Oklahoma Gypsum Co., 216 S.W. 992, 202 Mo.App. 667.

state, testimony as to the trouble and expense he is put to is admissible as damages naturally flowing from the breach.[81] Where the servant is to be paid, wholly or in part, otherwise than in money, evidence is admissible to show the money value of the medium of payment,[82] and in the case of a traveling salesman who is entitled to expenses on the road it is permissible to show what such expenses would probably have been had the contract not been broken.[83] Under an agreement to pay an injured employee certain wages as long as his disability to do full work shall continue, the employee may in an action for wrongful discharge, where it is shown that the injury is permanent, introduce evidence as to his expectancy of life[84] and as to his probable earnings.[85]

Evidence as to other employment. In an action for wrongful discharge, evidence is generally admissible on behalf of either party on the question of damages to show whether the employee has, or might have, obtained other remunerative[86] employment with the exercise of reasonable diligence.[87] Thus, except in a jurisdiction where the whole amount of the salary for the unexpired term becomes, by force of a statute, due and demandable on a wrongful discharge,[88] the employer may prove in mitigation of damages that after the discharge, and during the remainder of the time, the employee received, or was offered and might have received, in the exercise of diligence, wages in similar employment.[89] Evidence as to other employment which the employee might have obtained in the exercise of reasonable diligence must be confined to employment of the same or substantially similar character as that from which he was discharged.[90] In some cases it has been held that such evidence must be confined to the ability of the employee to have obtained employment in the same locality,[91] and where evidence has been introduced to show that the employee could have secured employment in a different locality, he may offer evidence to show the reasonableness of his refusal to accept such employment.[92]

Evidence as to the amount of his average earnings and the amount of his sales in a prior employment, of a similar but not identical character, is not admissible on behalf of the employee for the purpose of showing prospective profits which he might have made under his contract with the employer but for the wrongful termination thereof,[93] but evidence as to such sales in the same business, although carried on by different proprietors, is admissible.[94] Evidence of the employee's experience while in the employ of others, as well as of the employer, has been held to establish a sufficient foundation for testimony by him as to what his commissions would have been during the unexpired period.[95] Where a discharged employee instead of

accepting employment which he could have secured and for which he was fitted embarks in business for himself, evidence as to the details of such business subsequent to the expiration of a period of employment is inadmissible to show plaintiff's value to the business during such period.[96] Communications by the employer to others after the wrongful discharge stating that the employee was incompetent are admissible in evidence as bearing on the latter's inability to obtain other employment to mitigate the damages.[97]

c. Weight and Sufficiency

As a general rule, in an action for wrongful discharge the party having the affirmative of an issue must establish it by a preponderance of the evidence.

In accordance with the general rules as to the weight and sufficiency of the evidence in civil actions, an issue of fact in an action for a wrongful discharge ordinarily must be established by the party having the burden of proof thereof by a preponderance of the evidence.[98] Broadly speaking, the weight and sufficiency of the evidence in such an action is a question dependent on the facts and circumstances of the particular case, and is one wholly for the determination of the triers of the facts, whose finding will not be disturbed unless manifestly erroneous.[99]

The weight and sufficiency of the evidence have been considered in particular cases with respect to such matters as the existence of the contract of employment,[1] the definiteness of the term thereof,[2] performance of the contract by the employee,[3] or his readiness, ability, and willingness to perform,[4] the employee's breach of the contract,[5] the employer's waiver of such breach,[6] the employer's breach of the contract,[7] the discharge of the employee and the wrongfulness thereof,[8] the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain a verdict or judgment

c. Damages

a. In General

In actions for wrongful discharge, as in other actions, questions of law are for the court and, if the evidence justifies, questions of fact are for the jury.

In an action for wrongful discharge, as in other actions for breach of contract, the questions of law are for the court[13] and, where there is insufficient evidence to sustain the employee's cause of action, the complaint should be dismissed or a verdict directed for the employer.[14] Where the evidence justifies, questions of fact, or mixed questions of law and fact, are for the jury, under proper instructions by the court.[15] When the evidence is contradictory, the rule which requires that, on a motion to dismiss the complaint, plaintiff is entitled to have the court adopt a view most favorable to him should lead to a denial of the motion and a submission of the case to the jury.[16]

Waiver or condonation by employer. When condonation, waiver, or estoppel with respect to the employee's breach of contract is in issue, the question is one of fact to be determined by the jury[17] except where the evidence is such as to warrant the court assuming its sufficiency or insufficiency as a matter of law.[18]

b. Discharge and Sufficiency of Grounds Therefor

What constitutes a good and sufficient ground for discharge is, as a general rule, a question of law for the court. On the other hand, whether the employee was in fact discharged, and whether he committed the acts which justified his discharge are questions of fact for the jury, on conflicting evidence.

Whether the employee was in fact discharged[19] or voluntarily quit or resigned[20] ordinarily is a question of fact for the jury.

What constitutes a good and sufficient cause for the discharge of the employee is a question of law,[21] and, where the facts are undisputed, it is for the court to say whether the discharge was justified.[22]

Existence of contract of employment is for jury.

Reasonableness of order
(1) Where the reasonableness of the order disobeyed by the employee depends on undisputed facts and the inferences point one way, the question is one of law for the court.—May v. New York Motion Picture

Where, however, the facts are disputed, it is for the jury to say on all the evidence whether there were sufficient grounds to warrant the discharge.[23] So, where the facts are in dispute, whether the employee committed any of the acts which constitute ground for discharge,[24] as, for example, disobedience or insubordination,[25] is a matter for the jury, as is the reasonableness of excuses for nonperformance.[26] Nevertheless, the courts will not permit juries to guess or speculate when from the undisputed evidence it is apparent that the order of the employer was reasonable and that the employee was guilty of insubordination.[27]

Services satisfactory to employer. Where the contract provides that the employer can terminate the employment if not satisfied with the services rendered, the question whether or not the services were satisfactorily performed is a question to be determined by the employer and not by the jury.[28] However, the question whether the asserted dissatisfaction as a ground for discharge is in good faith or feigned is for the jury[29] where there is evidence tending to show that the discharge was due to reasons other than dissatisfaction.[30]

c. Damages

What are proper elements of damages presents a question of law for the court. On conflicting evidence, the existence of such elements and the amount of damage sustained are fact questions for the jury.

In accordance with general rules, the question of what elements of damage are proper to be considered in an action for wrongful discharge is one of law for the court[31] although, where the evidence is conflicting, the existence of such elements[32] and the amount of damage sustained[33] present questions of fact for the jury. Where no evidence of the damages is introduced the case should not be submitted to the jury.[34]

Mitigation of damages. Whether plaintiff, after discharge, made a bona fide effort for the purpose of reducing damages,[35] such as exercising reasonable diligence to obtain other employment,[36] and the reasonableness of an excuse for not so doing,[37] or what the employee could have earned by diligent efforts to secure other employment[38] are questions of fact for the jury. If there is no evidence in the case on the question, the defense of failure to seek other employment should not be submitted to the jury.[39]

Proof that the employee could have secured similar employment at similar wages does not require the case to be taken from the jury, since the employee may be entitled to actual or nominal damages for the breach.[40]

§ 55. —— Instructions

In an action for wrongful discharge the instructions must be confined to the issues made by the evidence and must correctly state the law applicable to the facts.

Each party in an action for wrongful discharge is entitled to instructions covering his theory of the case,[41] the instructions must conform, and be confined, to the issues made by the evidence,[42] and must correctly state the law applicable to the facts.[43] When the court instructs on what state of facts the verdict must be returned against defendant, the instructions must include all the facts material to the right of such party.[44] Where justification for the discharge has been urged in defense of the action, the court should instruct as to what amounts to legal justification, leaving to the jury to deter-

Charging facts as matter of law
Where the undisputed evidence establishes the existence of the contract of employment and the discharge of the employee, it is not error for the court to charge such facts as existing as a matter of law.—Stoffel v. Metcalfe Const. Co., 17 N.W.2d 3, 145 Neb. 450.

mine from the facts whether such justification existed.[45]

An instruction which covers the case generally is sufficient in the absence of a request for a more particular instruction[46] and it is not improper to refuse a charge argumentative in its tendency, and based on only a part of the testimony.[47] An instruction which is confusing or misleading to the jury should not be given and is properly refused,[48] as in the case of an instruction at variance with other instructions already given[49] or of an instruction that the burden was on the employee to prove performance of his contract and not on the employer to prove the employee's violation of any of the terms of the contract.[50]

The use of the phrase "the law presumes," although inapt, is not improper when it appears from the context of the charge that the court did not mean to instruct the jury that this was such a legal presumption as could not be rebutted by proof.[51] Although ordinarily a requested instruction should be given as asked, an addition of words which do not change or affect the meaning is not harmful and does not constitute error.[52]

Instructions as to damages. Appropriate instructions correctly stating the law on the question of damages may and should be given in an action for damages for breach of contract by wrongful discharge.[53] Instructions on damages which are inapplicable under the facts of the particular case, although correct in the abstract, should not be given and are properly refused.[54] If a requested instruction on the question of damages is erroneous it may be modified by the court to state the law correctly as applicable to the case.[55] Where there is evidence in the case on which the damages can properly be estimated, it is proper to refuse an instruction limiting recovery to nominal damages.[56] A charge authorizing an award of punitive damages is improper where, under the pleadings and evidence in the case, such damages are not an issue in the case.[57]

It is improper to refuse to charge that claims of damage which are speculative in character and incapable of reasonably exact computation cannot be made the basis of recovery.[58] Where the employer does not plead that the employee might have obtained other employment, or did so, an instruction that the latter, if entitled to recover, should recover the full amount agreed to be paid under the contract has been held warranted.[59] It has also been held that a charge that the verdict should be for the employer if it be established that the employee failed to seek other employment is erroneous and properly refused.[60] An instruction that, while there should be set off against the employee's damages such sum as he might have obtained or earned by working for others in a like service, the opportunity to be employed by others will not be presumed, but must be affirmatively shown by the em-

Violation of employer's instructions

In action against employers for breach of employment contract, in which employers set up defense that discharge was justified because of employee's breach of contract by violating instructions, trial court should have defined duties and obligations of employee to employers, and rights of employers as to discharging employee for violation of employment contract.—Stoffel v. Reason for rule

Defense that similar employment could have been obtained by exercise of reasonable diligence is made merely in mitigation of damages and not as complete bar to cause of action.—Atholwood Development Co. v. Houston, supra.

ployer, is proper,[61] and an instruction placing on the employee the burden of showing that he made diligent efforts to obtain other employment is improper.[62] It is not improper to charge that a request by the employer that the employee should return to work after a discharge is to be considered only with reference to mitigation of damages.[63] Where it appears that the venture of the employee in business on his own account after discharge was unprofitable, it has been held not erroneous to refuse to charge that it is for the jury to determine, in mitigation of damages, the reasonable value of his services.[64] So, where under the contract the employee had the right to do outside work which did not interfere with the employer's requirements, and there was no contradiction of the employee's evidence that his outside earnings did not interfere with his duty to the employer, the court should instruct that the employee's damage was the agreed salary for the balance of the term.[65] Where the employee was permitted under the terms of his contract to do work for others, an instruction that the employer was entitled to a reduction of the amount that the employee earned or might have earned for the remainder of the term is erroneous as applying the same measure of damages to breach of contract for part time employment as that applicable to a case of hiring for full time employment.[66]

§ 56. —— Review

The general rules as to review in civil actions are discussed in Appeal and Error.

§ 57. —— Attorney's Fees

A statute providing for an attorney's fee in an action for wages is inapplicable in an action for damages for a wrongful discharge.

A statute providing for attorney's fees when an employee brings a suit for wages owing under the terms of the contract of employment does not apply when the employee sues for damages for a wrongful discharge.[67]

§ 58. —— Damages in General

a. In general
b. Elements of damages
c. Punitive damages
d. Nominal damages
e. As dependent on time of bringing suit

a. In General

As a general rule the measure of damages in an action for breach of contract by wrongful discharge is the actual loss sustained by the employee by reason of his discharge.

In an action for breach of a contract of employment by wrongful discharge before expiration of the term fixed in such contract, the real measure of the employee's damages or recovery is the loss actually sustained by him by reason of the wrongful discharge,[68] together with compensation for the services performed.[69] Broadly speaking, this loss consists of the stipulated wages for the unexpired may have earned, or with reasonable diligence might have earned, from other employment for the balance of the term. Such money received by the employee from the employer after the breach of contract as he would not have received had he continued in the employ of the employer has also been held to be a proper item in reduction of damages.[74] Where the contract is indefinite as to the rate of wages, the measure of damages is obtained by considering the usual wages for the employment contracted for, and what time would be lost before similar employment could be obtained.[75]

Contract for permanent employment. A contract for permanent employment is not rendered so indefinite by the uncertainty of the length of life of the employee as to preclude him from recovering substantial damages for breach of such a contract.[76] The damages recoverable in such a case have been held to be the wages lost up to the time of trial plus the loss of wages based on the employee's lifetime expectancy.[77] In an action for breach of a contract to give plaintiff lifetime employment of the kind he was performing at the time of the execution of the contract, at the regular compensation for such employment, plaintiff has been limited in his recovery to compensation for the period sued for at the regular rate for the employment contracted, although at the time of the discharge plaintiff occupied a higher position with increased compensation.[78]

Indefinite or uncertain term of employment. It has been held that the measure of damages for breach of a contract of employment for an indefinite period at a monthly salary is the worth of the bargain to the employee.[79] The measure of damages for breach of a contract of employment, uncertain in point of time, has been held to be the sum due for the work done under the contract, if any, together with compensation for such future benefits as under all circumstances would probably be realized by the employee in its performance.[80]

Accrued right not abridged by subsequent happening. Where the contract is wrongfully broken by the employer, the employee may recover damages for the full amount due under the contract notwithstanding, if it had not been broken, it would have been abrogated, before its expiration, by the subsequent death of the employer.[81]

Contract terminable on notice. Where the contract of employment provides for termination thereon on the giving of a specified notice, the value of the contract constitutes the measure of damage for breach by wrongful discharge.[82] Under such a contract a discharge without the required notice has the effect, with respect to damages for the breach, of terminating the contract as of the earliest time if notice had been given.[83] Hence, where the contract provides for its continuance from year to year subject to termination as of the end of any year on the giving of a specified notice, an employee discharged during a year without having been given the required notice is entitled to recover damages for the term of a year.[84] However, when by its terms, or custom, the contract of employment may be terminated at any time on the giving of a specified notice, the damages for a wrongful discharge can be no more than the wages which would have accrued under the contract after the notice, had one been given.[85] It has also been held that a discharge is not equivalent to a notice so as to limit the employee's damages to the period of the stipulated notice, when the discharge occurred prior to the time when notice could have been given under the contract, and particularly when the relief from liability was based on the continuance of the contract and not on its cancellation.[86]

Quantum meruit. Where a discharged employee treats the contract as rescinded, thereby barring his right to an action for breach of contract, as discussed supra § 50, he may, in an action on quantum meruit, recover the full value of the services performed regardless of the contract price.[87]

Under statute. Under some statutes an employee discharged before the expiration of the term, without any serious ground of complaint, is entitled to recover the whole salary which he would have been entitled to receive had the full term of his services arrived,[88] and, as discussed infra § 59, this right is not affected by the subsequent engagement by the employee of his services to another. Remote and conjectural damages will not be allowed under some statutes,[89] but the expense of returning to the place where plaintiff was hired and from which he removed to undertake the employment is recoverable,[90] although it has been held that the statute cannot be extended to anything else than wages.[91] The statute is a penal one[92] and does not apply to contracts of hiring purely executory in their nature.[93]

b. Elements of Damages

(1) In general
(2) Profits or commissions

(1) In General

The damages for breach of a contract of employment may include, among other items, expenses necessarily incurred in connection with the employment.

The damages for breach of a contract of employment may include expenses necessarily incurred in connection with the employment,[94] as well as expenses incurred in obtaining new employment[95]

Discharge as notice

When contract is terminable at any time on notice and servant is discharged without formal notice, discharge is to be regarded as notice, and servant may recover wages up to time of discharge, but only nominal damages for discharge.—Freiburger v. Texas Co., supra.

Consideration for contract

Where employment contract was terminable on thirty days' notice and employee was discharged without notice after being employed about seven months, in action for breach of contract and for a sum allegedly paid by employee as consideration for the contract, employee was not entitled to such sum, since he received the contract and his action affirmed it.—Bitterman v. Clothing

In action by cashier for wrongful discharge by summer resort hotel, permitting jury to consider items of clothing allegedly purchased by plaintiff to enable her to carry out her duties was error, since the cost of such items was not a direct loss caused by alleged breach.—West v. Scaroon Hotel Corp., 67 N.Y.S.2d 163, 187 Misc. 539.

Transportation expenses

(1) Damages for wrongful discharge at a place away from employee's home have been held not to include expenses in coming from or returning to such home.—Rench v. Hayes Equipment Mfg. Co., 8 P.2d 346, 134 Kan. 865, 84 A.L.R. 166.

(2) It has also been held that expenses of transportation may be included, but not hotel bills or other expenses which he would have to bear in any event.—Robertson v. Charles Frohman, Inc., 191 N.Y.S. 55, 198 App.Div. 782.

Tort damages

Where contract made no reference to a distributing organization, plaintiff could not recover for defendants' appropriation of plaintiff's distributing organization, since, while it is actionable for a third person having knowledge that an employee is working under contract to induce such employee to break his contract, such conduct is a tort and not a breach of contract.—Buxbom v. Smith, Cal., 132 P.2d 4, reheard 145 P.2d 305, 23 Cal.2d 535.

Reduction of mitigating elements

The reasonable cost of obtaining other employment goes to reduce the amount of earnings received from such other employment and offered in mitigation of the employee's damages.—Ray v. Board of Education of Pond Creek, Grant County, 153 P.2d 233, 194 Okl. 472.

and in removal to the new place of employment.[96] Where a rule of an employer provides for an indemnity in case of a dismissal, the employee is entitled to have it included in damages for breach of contract,[97] but recovery cannot be had of a payment not absolutely due, but contingent on the employer's continuing in business.[98] Where another consideration than the payment of money is to be part of compensation for the services, as in the case of the furnishing of board and lodging[99] or an allowance therefor,[1] or the right to the use of a house,[2] damages are recoverable for the deprivation of such right or use, and where a servant whose compensation in part is to be derived from the use of a house is, by a wrongful discharge, forced to remove, he may also recover the cost of such removal.[3]

As discussed supra subdivision a of this section, the stipulated wages for the unexpired term are prima facie the measure of recovery in actions for breach of contract by wrongful discharge, and it has been held that, in the absence of a wrongful act tantamount to a trespass accompanied by actual or constructive force, no additional elements, over and above the stipulated wages for the unexpired term, can enter into making up the measure of damages.[4] It is also generally held that in the absence of any agreement therefor, damages are not recoverable for an injury to the employee's good name, character, or reputation,[5] or for an injury to his business reputation[6] or good will,[7] or for an injury to his health,[8] or for physical[9] or mental[10] pain and suffering, or for the loss of advantages which would have accrued by a continuation of employment.[11]

A loss suffered by the employee in complying with the terms of the contract of employment has been held not to be a proper element of damages.[12] However, where the employer sold stock to the employee as an inducement for entering into the employment contract, the employee has been held entitled to recover the value of the stock predicated on the amount he was required to pay therefor

12. Or.—Smith v. Pallay, 279 P. 279, 130 Or. 282.

Reason for rule
He is not entitled to recover for what he has agreed to do in performing the contract on his part and at the same time recover what the employer promised to pay for his performance.—Smith v. Pallay, supra.

Loss of organization
Where plaintiff sued for breach of contract of employment to manage publication of a newspaper, damages awarded for loss of trained organization and good will could not be sustained, since in performing contract alleged plaintiff needed no such organization, and defendants' refusal to perform contract could not have resulted in such damage.—Buxbom v. Smith, Cal., 132 P.2d 4, reheard 145 P.2d 305, 23 Cal.2d 535.

Sale of car
The employee cannot recover damages suffered in the sale of a car which he was required to purchase by the contract of employment.—Smith v. Pallay, 279 P. 279, 130 Or. 282.

Employee agreeing to give up law practice as part consideration for employment could not recover compensation therefor as damages for wrongful discharge.—Smith v. Pallay, supra.

in accordance with the terms of the contract.[13]

Interest. Interest from the date of discharge has been held allowable as an element of damages in an action for breach of contract by wrongful discharge,[14] at least where the contract of employment is in writing.[15] It has also been held that an employee wrongfully discharged before the expiration of his contract of employment may recover interest on the amount of wages due to him according to contract from the date of his discharge to the expiration of the period,[16] if the action is not brought before the expiration of the agreed term.[17]

(2) Profits or Commissions

Profits or commissions, if definitely ascertainable, are recoverable as damages in an action for wrongful discharge.

Profits or commissions, if definitely ascertainable, which the employee might have realized had he been permitted to perform under the employment contract are recoverable as damages,[18] and it has generally been held that the fact that the damages consist of profits lost will not prevent their recovery if the evidence furnishes reasonable data on which to compute them.[19] In the case of an employment on a commission basis with the employee bearing the expenses entailed in obtaining business for the employer, the damages are the probable gross commissions for the balance of the term less expenses which necessarily would have been incurred by the employee in connection therewith.[20] The damages of an employee on a commission or profit-sharing basis who has been allowed a definite drawing account have been held to be at least equal to such drawing account, when the employer has put it out of the power of the employee to prove absolutely what the amount of his commissions or profits would have been;[21] and this is true although the drawing account exceeded the commissions earned up to the time of discharge[22] and even though no commissions had been earned up to such time against which the drawing account could have been applied.[23] In the absence of an express or implied agreement on the part of the employee to repay the advances made, the measure of damages in the case of a salesman tendering his services and earning

Installment contract
In an action for breach of contract of employment, brought before the end of the term, plaintiff was not entitled to interest on the whole amount sued for from institution of the suit, but only on monthly installments of salary as they became due, before or after institution of the suit.—Puller v. Royal Casualty Co., 196 S.W. 755, 271 Mo. 369.

Wages due in future
Interest on wages due in the future is not allowable as an element of damages.—Hollwedel v. Duffy-Mott Co., 188 N.E. 266, 263 N.Y. 95, 90 A.L.R. 1312, motion denied 188 N.E. 102, 262 N.Y. 643.

Reasonable probability
(1) Salesman's damages for wrongful discharge are measured by commissions which he might have earned during remainder of term under reasonable probabilities.—Prescott v. Buffalo Fire Appliance Corporation, 260 N.Y.S. 840, 237 App.Div. 198, affirmed 188 N.E. 27, 262 N.Y. 475.

(2) Commissions which salesman might have received from reorders during his contract period if original orders had been properly filled by employer would be entirely speculative, and could not be recovered in salesman's action for wrongful discharge.—Horn v. Atlas Corrugated Case Co., 12 N.Y.S.2d 508, 257 App. Div. 194.

Profits from sale of stock
(1) Where contract entitled employee to share in net profits realized by employer from the sale of certain stock and the employer exchanged such stock for other securities, the employee is entitled to share in the increase in value of the securities taken in exchange.—Chapin v. Learnard, 158 N.E. 58, 246 N.Y. 158, reargument denied 159 N.E. 679, 246 N.Y. 629.

(2) Profits on the exchange of the stock are determinable by conditions existing when contract was breached.—Chapin v. Learnard, 159 N.E. 679, 246 N.Y. 629.

Damages held conjectural
In action by discharged club manager whose agreed compensation was per cent of sums obtained from members, where evidence did not show how many new members were obtained after discharge, damages after discharge were held too conjectural.—Willis v. nothing during the unexpired period is prima facie his stipulated drawing account for such period.[24] However, a drawing account given only for traveling expenses does not establish a minimum of damages,[25] and, when the drawing account includes amounts to be disbursed by the employee for traveling expenses, the probable amount of such expenses, as based on the average of his expenses while in the employ, should be deducted.[26] On breach of a contract for services to be performed on commission, where the injured party has partly performed and has earned and collected profits which were necessarily earned as a result of the expenditures made by him in performing the contract, he cannot recover both the expenses incurred and the profits earned.[27]

When a contract of employment contemplates not only the services, but the use also of property and equipment of the employee, he may recover for the loss of the profits he would have received under the contract,[28] less any net sums he may have received from his services and the use of his equipment, after deducting his expenses, in other employment.[29] It has also been held that, where an employee, by reason of the breach of the contract of the employer, lost his equipment through his inability to pay installments due thereon and which he would have been able to pay if not wrongfully discharged, he could recover the profits which he would have made from the use of his property.[30]

c. Punitive Damages

As a general rule exemplary or punitive damages are not recoverable in an action for wrongful discharge.

Although punitive damages ordinarily are not recoverable,[31] in some jurisdictions, where the discharge is accompanied by malicious and oppressive conduct, the employer is liable not only for actual, but also for exemplary, damages.[32]

d. Nominal Damages

Only nominal damages are recoverable in an action for wrongful discharge if no reasonable basis for estimating the damages is found in the evidence.

Only nominal damages can be recovered when by reason of the mode of compensation[33] or of the uncertainty of the contract[34] the evidence affords no reasonably definite basis on which to estimate the damages. On the other hand, although an employee fails to show substantial damage, he can recover at least nominal damages for a breach of contract by the employer,[35] and this has been held to be true even though the salary earned in substituted employment is the same as that contracted for[36] or even though he is benefited by the discharge.[37]

(1) Suit brought before expiration of term
(2) Suit brought after expiration of term

(1) Suit Brought before Expiration of Term

(a) Trial before expiration of term
(b) Trial after expiration of term

(a) Trial before Expiration of Term

Where an action for wrongful discharge is tried before expiration of the term the authorities differ on the question whether damages are to be computed up to the time of trial or for the whole of the unexpired term.

There is a decided conflict of authority as to the damages recoverable where the action is tried before the expiration of the term. Some decisions have held that damages are to be computed up to, but not after, the time of trial,[38] while in other jurisdictions it has been held that damages for the whole term are recoverable.[39] Where damages for the whole term are recoverable, the measure of damages is the present value of the contract to the employee.[40] While the discharged employee's damages may be measured prima facie by the unpaid wage, it is the present worth of the obligation to pay the wages at a time in the future that fixes the damages, in fixing which may be considered not only time, but also the uncertainty of human life.[41] Also to be taken into consideration are such elements as the probable future earnings, possible sickness, and discount for payment in advance.[42]

Right to interest as element of damage as affected by time of bringing suit see supra subdivision b (1) of this section.

Damages to date of institution of action only are recoverable.—Robinson v. McAlhaney, 6 S.E.2d 517, 216 N.C. 674.

(b) Trial after Expiration of Term

Where an action for wrongful discharge, although instituted prior thereto, is tried after expiration of the contract term, damages are to be computed as though the action were instituted after such expiration.

Where an employee's action is brought before the expiration of the term of service, but the trial is had after the expiration of the term, damages may be awarded as though the suit had been brought after the expiration of the term.[43]

(2) Suit Brought after Expiration of Term

Where an action for wrongful discharge is brought after the expiration of the term of services, the servant is entitled to full damages.

Where an action for wrongful discharge is brought after the expiration of the term of services, the servant is entitled to full damages,[44] which, as discussed supra subdivision a of this section, are prima facie the stipulated wages for the term.

§ 59. —— Other Employment as Ground for Reduction of Damages

a. In general
b. Efforts to obtain; nature of employment
c. Reëmployment by master
d. Where employee works for himself

a. In General

As a general rule compensation which the wrongfully discharged employee may have earned, or by diligence might have earned, from other similar employment during the unexpired term goes to mitigate or reduce the damages which he may recover.

In Texas

(1) The rule of the text is generally followed.—Litchenstein v. Brooks, 12 S.W. 975, 75 Tex. 196—Galveston, H. & S. A. Ry. Co. v. Eubanks, Civ. App., 42 S.W.2d 475, affirmed Eubanks v. Galveston, H. & S. A. Ry. Co., Com.App., 59 S.W.2d 825—Louisiana, Rio Grande Canal Co. v. Quinn, Civ.App., 161 S.W. 375—Pacific Express Co. v. Walters, 93 S. W. 497, 42 Tex.Civ.App. 355.

(2) A discharged employee, suing for damages before expiration of the contract, waives damages for the period following the trial.—Southern Properties v. Carpenter, Civ.App., 21 S.W.2d 372, error dismissed—Southern Properties v. Carpenter, Civ.App., 300 S.W. 963.

(3) An employee who asks only for damages to the time of trial waives any claim for the balance.—Weber Gas & Gasoline Engine Co. v. Bradford, 79 S.W. 46, 34 Tex.Civ. App. 543.

(4) However, in an early case it was held that the present value of payment may be considered by the jury in estimating damages, where the action is brought before all wages are due.—Kelly Plow Co. v. London, 125 S.W. 974, 59 Tex.Civ. App. 208.

Cal.—Wood v. Girot, 282 P. 981, 102 Cal.App. 160.
Or.—Smith v. Pallay, 279 P. 279, 130 Or. 282.
39 C.J. p 114 note 1.

Reason for rule

The contract of employment is entire and not severable.—Wood v. Girot, 282 P. 981, 102 Cal.App. 160.

Reasonable certainty

Damages which will arise with reasonable certainty after the trial are recoverable.—Smith v. Pallay, 279 P. 279, 130 Or. 282.

Damages under optional renewal contract

Damages for the renewal period under a contract giving the employee an option to renew for an additional period are not too speculative and are recoverable.—Detroit Graphite Co. v. Hoover, C.C.A.Mass., 41 F. 2d 490.

Ohio.—Rorick v. Gilbert, 186 N.E. 756, 45 Ohio App. 96, affirmed Gilbert v. Rorick, 186 N.E. 90, 125 Ohio St. 636.

Basis for computation of damages to discharged employee for breach of unexpired employment contract is total amount of installments accruing after breach which employee would in jury's opinion have lived to earn, subject to all proved diminutions.—Hollwedel v. Duffy-Mott Co., 264 N.Y.S. 745, 238 App.Div. 468, motion denied 188 N.E. 102, 262 N.Y. 643, modified on other grounds 188 N.E. 266, 263 N.Y. 95, 90 A.L.R. 1312.

Acceleration of wages

Employer's wrongful discharge of employee did not entitle employee to acceleration of due date of future wages under unexpired term.—Hollwedel v. Duffy-Mott Co., 188 N.E. 266, 263 N.Y. 95, 90 A.L.R. 1312.

42. Ohio.—Rorick v. Gilbert, 186 N. E. 756, 45 Ohio App. 96, affirmed Gilbert v. Rorick, 186 N.E. 90, 125 Ohio St. 636.

Form of action immaterial

Whether employee's action against employer for wrongful discharge was for recovery of wages or damages for breach of contract was immaterial, where term of contract had expired at time of trial since measure of recovery was the same.—Standard Laundry Service v. Pastelnick, 184 S.E. 193, 166 Va. 125.

mitigate or reduce the damages which he may recover. The rule applies although the contract of employment includes not only the personal services of plaintiff, but also those of such others as are necessary for the performance of the contract.[48] Where the amount received in other employment equals or exceeds that contracted for, there can be no recovery.[49]

An exception to the rule requiring the employee to mitigate damages exists under statutes providing that an employee wrongfully discharged may recover for the full term for which he was employed.[50] An exception also exists in cases where the services contemplated by the contract of employment are consistent with the pursuit of other duties by the employee and do not purport to occupy all of his time.[51] Thus excluded from the rule is the case of a salesman or part-time servant when the money earned by him after the discharge could likewise have been earned by him without a violation of his duty under the contract if he had not been discharged,[52] even though he made more money after the breach than before.[53] On the other hand, one who, by the terms of his contract, is permitted to do similar work for others cannot, on his discharge, recover damages based on the loss of his earnings from such others, these being too remote and speculative.[54] The rule also is not applicable where the contract of hiring is not for a specified length of time, but for the performance of certain work within a time set, during which time the employee is obligated to keep himself in readiness at all times.[55]

Incapacitation or illness. If a discharged employee whose duty it is to obtain other employment so as to reduce the amount of the employer's liability willfully incapacitates himself, it is proper to find and deduct the earnings of which he deprived himself by the incapacitation.[56] The period of a temporary illness cannot be deducted from the period for which the wrongfully discharged employee can recover damages,[57] nor is his right of recovery affected by a sickness in the new employment, for which he was not discharged, although, had he been retained in the original employment, it would have been a sufficient ground for discharge under the terms of the contract;[58] but it has been held that, where the contract of employment provided that no compensation was to be paid during disability, and the servant was ill for the greater part of the unexpired term after discharge so that he would not have received under his employment more than he received elsewhere, the jury were justified in finding that he sustained no damages.[59]

b. Efforts to Obtain; Nature of Employment

Generally a wrongfully discharged employee is required to use only reasonable diligence to obtain other employment of similar or substantially the same character and grade as that from which he was discharged.

Contract to pay unjustly discharged employee "for all time lost" required only payment for loss of earnings, and did not set aside common-law rule as to measure of damages for breach of contract and substitute new measure.—Eubanks v. Galveston, H. & S. A. Ry. Co., Tex. Com.App., 59 S.W.2d 825.

Vacation trip

Measure of damages
Where employment contract permits employee to do outside work as long as such work does not interfere with employer's requirements, on wrongful discharge the damage to the employee is measured by the agreed wage during the remainder of the term, reduced by such part of his earnings during the same period as he could not have earned if he had continued in the employment.—Sanders v. While, as discussed supra subdivision a of this section, it is the duty of a discharged servant to seek other employment, he is required to use only reasonable diligence[60] to obtain employment of similar or substantially the same character and grade as that in which he has been employed.[61] Likewise the employee is not bound to accept employment in a different place,[62] or employment under an unsuitable employer,[63] or under a contract extending for a period in excess of the unexpired term,[64] or of a nature which would injuriously affect his future career or reputation.[65] Where, however, an employee is offered the same or similar employment to that from which he has been discharged for the same period and on the same terms, and before he has sustained any injury by reason of the discharge, he cannot recover any damages.[66]

A discharged servant is not obliged to seek another salaried position; it is sufficient that he makes a bona fide attempt to employ his time profitably in a remunerative occupation,[67] and he is entitled to a reasonable time in which to seek and find or make the business that he wants.[68]

c. Reëmployment by Master

An offer made in good faith by the employer to reemploy the employee on the same terms as under the breached contract as a general rule goes to mitigate damages, if rejected by the employee.

Reëmployment by former employer

Plaintiff, on being discharged by defendants in breach of oral contract of hiring, was under no obligation to seek reëmployment with a former employer whose services he left to take up employment with defendants.—Lucacher v. Kerson, 45 A.2d 245, 158 Pa.Super. 437, affirmed 48 A.2d 857, 355 Pa. 79.

Dissimilar or incompatible employment

(1) Amounts to be applied in mitigation of damages for breach of employment contract do not include money earned in employment not of equal grade and of more menial or onerous kind.—Standard Oil Co. v. Lloyd, 159 So. 371, 26 Ala.App. 306.

(2) Earnings that employee actually received in dissimilar employment should not be credited on his contractual damages unless the employment is shown to have been incompatible with his contractual service.—Martin v. Board of Education of Lincoln County, 199 S.E. 887, 120 W.Va. 621.

Employment suitable to employee

(1) Wrongfully discharged employee has right to seek same character of employment as that from which he was discharged, and, if he cannot secure similar employment, he is required to use reasonable diligence to secure other employment for which he is reasonably fitted, but he is not bound to mitigate damages by accepting any employment or to look for or accept employment of substantially different character.—Torson Const. Co. v. Grant, 66 S.W.2d 79, 251 Ky. 800.

(2) Other employment for which employee is fitted should be sought if employment of substantially same character cannot be obtained.—San Antonio & A. P. Ry. Co. v. Collins, Tex.Com.App., 61 S.W.2d 84.

An offer of the employer to reëmploy the discharged employee at the same compensation and in the same general line of work or business as that provided for by the breached contract generally must be accepted by the employee, if it can be done without prejudice to his claim for damages, or it operates to mitigate or reduce his damages.[69] However, an employer, by his conduct, may have rendered himself so objectionable that a discharged employee is under no obligation to return to his service.[70] In any event the offer must be made in good faith and not merely as a foundation for mitigation of damages.[71] Furthermore, a servant cannot be required to accept reëmployment under circumstances which permit the claim that he consents to a modification of the contract,[72] and ordinarily acceptance of service in silence will at least give color to a claim that the contract is modified by consent, tacit, if not express.[73]

d. Where Employee Works for Himself

The value of the employee's services to himself where he engages in work on his own account after his discharge may sometimes be taken into account in assessing damages for his wrongful discharge.

Where, after his discharge, the servant engages in work on his own account, the value of his work to himself should be taken into account in assessing his damages in an action for wrongful discharge,[74] but where the discharged employee, after having failed to obtain similar work, goes into business for himself, and fails to make any profits, no reduction can be made in the damages for the value of his services for the time so employed.[75] Where, after discharge, profits are earned by the discharged employee through assets invested and a responsibility incurred, and not by reason of the time and ability he had contracted to give to the former employment, such earnings are not to be applied in mitigation of damages.[76]

proper materials and place for the grade of work contracted for,[78] the obligation continuing through the stipulated term where the employment is for a definite period.[79] He may refuse his employee further work at any time, without incurring liability therefor, where the contract is terminable at the will of either party,[80] or where he agreed to pay only for work to be furnished at his option,[81] or only for actual services performed,[82] unless there are other controlling provisions in the contract indicating a contrary intention.[83]

Where there is no duty resting on the employer, from custom or contract, express or implied, to furnish means of transportation to his employee to and from work, the burden is cast on the employee to provide himself with such transportation.[84] A duty to furnish transportation, arising out of the conduct of the parties, is as binding as though there had been an express agreement.[85]

Excuses for nonperformance. The employer cannot relieve himself of the obligation imposed on him under the contract by rendering performance by the employee impossible.[86] In the absence of a stipulation in the contract, the master is not excused from performance by reason of a change of conditions rendering performance unprofitable.[87] The employer's failure to furnish work is not excused by a temporary or permanent discontinuance of the employer's business,[88] or its retrenchment during a period of business depression.[89]

§ 62. —— Duty of Employee to Render Services

The employee must perform, or be ready and willing to perform, the services required by the contract of employment unless there exists a valid excuse for nonperformance.

The employee must perform, or be ready and willing to perform, the services called for by the contract.[90] There is an obligation on the part of the servant, implied from the contract of employment, to obey the lawful[91] and reasonable[92] commands of his master. No man has a legal or moral right, while continuing in the employ of another, to refuse to do the work he is employed to do.[93]

Where performance by the employee is conditioned on the fulfillment of a condition precedent, he is under no duty to perform until such condition precedent has been met.[94]

Excuses for nonperformance. The employee is excused from performance by illness incapacitating him for the service,[95] or by acts of the employer making performance impossible,[96] or by acts or events for which neither party is responsible.[97] Where the employer fails to pay the salary specified in the contract of employment, the employee is not bound to continue to serve the employer and has a right to abandon the contract.[98]

§ 63. —— Nature and Extent of Services

The nature and extent of the services to be performed by an employee, including the hours and places of service, are to be ascertained from the contract of employment.

The nature and extent of the services to be performed by an employee are to be ascertained from the contract of employment[99] and, in determining what services must be rendered under the contract of employment, the rules applicable in the construction of contracts generally apply.[1] In construing a contract of employment, where the contract is silent as to the duties to be performed by the employees, it will be presumed that the parties had in mind reasonable duties; that they had contracted with respect to the reasonable and not the unreasonable.[2] Under a contract of general employment the servant may be required to do any and all things that are embraced within the scope of the general employment.[3]

An employer has no right to make a material change in the position to which his employee is entitled under the contract of employment, and the employee is justified in refusing to submit to such change.[4] A person who is engaged as a superintendent, or in some leading capacity requiring more than ordinary skill, is not obliged to take an inferior position or to perform ordinary labor,[5] although, when called on, he must assume charge of work which, although strictly not the work for which he was employed, is still necessarily or reasonably incidental to it.[6] So one engaged for general work of a particular kind must be ready to perform any kind of work reasonably incidental to it,[7] but he is not obliged to accept employment of an entirely different kind.[8] An agreement to perform services when requested implies that the services are not to be steady or continuous, and the requests must be reasonable.[9]

An employee hired for one kind of work may be placed on other work temporarily, where the contract so provides,[10] or is based on a trade custom to

94. Giving of notice by employer

Contract of third person guaranteeing salary
Where contract of irrigation company's stockholder guaranteeing salary of company's manager gave manager election on stockholders' sale of stock to receive salary for balance of employment term from stockholder on condition that he devote his time and services for stockholder's benefit, whether condition named by stockholder after sale of stock was reasonable was to be that effect.[11] After the termination of the employment the employer cannot command the services of the employee.[12]

Place of rendering services. The employee is under the obligation to perform the services contracted for in such place or places as are specified in the contract.[13] Where the contract so provides, the employee may be required to render services in any part of the United States.[14] On the other hand, the employee is not bound to perform services in a place different from that provided for in the contract.[15]

Hours or days of services. Subject to statutory regulations, the employer has the right to fix the hours within which the work is to be performed.[16] The hours which the employee must work depend on the terms of the contract.[17] Work during unreasonable hours is not required unless the terms of the contract and the nature of the employment make it reasonably necessary.[18] The question whether Sunday work is required under a contract calling for all the time of the employee depends on the custom followed in the business in which he is employed.[19] An employee, in an indeterminate employment, who is not paid for days he does not work, commits no breach of the contract of employment by failing to work on a particular day.[20]

§ 64. —— Substitution of Parties

An employee may not, without the consent of his employer, substitute another in his place to perform his services.

An employee may not, without the consent of his employer, substitute another in his place to perform his services,[21] and, if he does make the substitution without the employer's knowledge, he cannot recover from the employer for the services of the substitute, even though it is shown that the substitute did the work equally as well as the employee.[22]

"Sale" of baseball players. The performance of conditions precedent by an employer baseball club, necessary under a player's contract before it can substitute another club in its place, will not be presumed from the mere act of attempted abrogation by it of its contract and the substitution of another in its stead.[23]

§ 65. —— Tender of Performance

The extent to which an employee must manifest his willingness to perform depends on the attitude and conduct of the employer.

How far an employee must go in evidencing his willingness to perform, or in making a tender of performance, depends on the attitude and conduct of the employer,[24] no formal or actual tender being necessary where the employer refuses to furnish work or to continue the employment.[25] The prop-determined in light of the intention of the parties in making the contract, and a proffer of employment as a traveling salesman for one of interrelated corporations through which stockholder was conducting his business at time contract was negotiated was not so unreasonable, notwithstanding manager was a mechanical engineer by profession, as to entitle manager to recover damages for stockholder's alleged breach of contract in failing to proffer reasonable employment.—Guardian Trust Co. v. er time[26] and place[27] for making a tender of services varies with the terms of the contract and circumstances in each case. A tender to be effectual must be free of conditions not provided for by the contract.[28]

§ 66. —— Sufficiency of Performance

A substantial performance on the part of the servant generally is regarded as sufficient.

As a general rule, a substantial performance on the part of the servant is regarded as sufficient,[29] and, unless the employee has agreed to procure particular results, the results of his performance are not material.[30]

§ 67. —— Honesty and Faithfulness

An employee is under an obligation to serve his employer honestly and faithfully.

There is an implied agreement on the part of the employee in every contract of service that he will serve his employer honestly and faithfully.[31] It is his duty to communicate to him all facts which he ought to know.[32]

§ 68. —— Compelling Performance

The rendition of personal services by an employee ordinarily cannot be compelled by order of court.

The rendition of personal services by an employee, or his return to his employer's service, ordinarily cannot be compelled by an injunction, or by an action for specific performance, as discussed in the C.J.S. titles Injunctions § 82 b, and Specific Performance § 82, also 58 C.J. page 1056 note 10 et seq, or in any other way by an order of court.[33]

§ 69. Skill and Care Required of Employee

An employee impliedly agrees that he is competent to do the work and that he will perform it faithfully.

In the absence of an express agreement as to the skill which the employee must possess and the care which he shall exercise,[34] one employed to perform certain work for another impliedly agrees that he is competent to do the work and that he will perform it faithfully.[35] It is not sufficient that the employee

Public accountants
(1) Certified public accountants were not guarantors or insurers of correctness of their accounts, but undertook to use such skill in performance of their agreement to render services as reasonably prudent, skillful accountants would use under circumstances.—O'Neill v. Atlas Automobile Finance Corporation, 11 A.2d 782, 139 Pa.Super. 346.

shall have done the best that he could.[36] Where there is no express contract between an employer and an employee, imposing on the employee a higher degree of skill, care, diligence, and attention in the discharge of the position he contracted to fill, only the ordinary and reasonable skill, care, diligence, and attention implied by law can be required of him.[37]

In measuring the competency and care to be demanded of an employee, there must be taken into consideration his known standing in his trade,[38] the compensation paid to him,[39] the place of performance,[40] and the nature of the work to be done.[41] He is not required to guard against mere errors of judgment,[42] or conditions and causes beyond his control.[43]

Where the employee contracts for a higher degree of skill, care, and diligence than the law implies, he cannot excuse himself from a failure to live up to his contract by merely showing that he performed the duties of his position with the ordinary and reasonable degree of skill, care, and diligence required of him by law; he must perform his duties with the degree and grade of service for which he contracts.[44]

Particular methods of work. Generally, an employee is not required to secure his employer's consent to a particular method of doing his work.[45] In the absence of instructions, he can do it in his own way, provided only he uses reasonable care.[46] On the other hand, if the employer prescribes the methods of work, the employee's use of skill and care does not relieve him of his obligation to obey the rules laid down, but it does relieve him of all responsibility for the result.[47]

Custody of property. An employee's possession of his employer's property, by permission, is lawful but it is not legal possession in the sense in which that term is used in contrast to mere physical possession without any right of ownership; in the absence of a showing by the employee that he was given an unqualified right to have and retain possession of his employer's property, he may not withhold physical control of it from his employer, to whom belongs the absolute legal ownership and right of control.[48]

§ 70. Duty to Serve Employer Exclusively

In the absence of an agreement to devote his entire services to his employer, an employee may employ such time as is not required in the performance of his duty in such way as he may deem advantageous, provided it is not inconsistent with his contract or detrimental to his employer's interest or to the value of his services to his employer.

In the absence of an express or implied agreement on the part of the employee to devote his entire services to the service of the employer, he may employ such time as is not required in the performance of his duty to his employer in such way as he may deem advantageous to himself, provided it is not inconsistent with his contract or detrimental to his employer's interest or to the value of his services to his employer.[49] Where a contract of employment contains no provision permitting the employee to hold another position simultaneously, the implication is that the employee will give his full day's work to the services of his employer.[50] However, even where there is an express stipulation that the employee shall devote his whole time to the service,[51] or the best part of his time,[52] or shall not engage in any other business prejudicial to his employer's interest,[53] the agreement must be reasonably construed.

(3) Where examinations of brokers' accounts by accountants were to embrace verification of cash, securities, and customers' accounts, accountants were required to exercise reasonable skill and diligence in making actual determination of brokers' cash position and not a mere arithmetical bookkeeping computation, and they assumed risk of nonperformance of their contracts.—National Surety Corporation v. Lybrand, supra.

An employment requiring the constant and continuous attention of the employee,[54] the constant payment of wages,[55] or the constant furnishing of food, fuel, and rent where they are a part of the consideration for the service,[56] is indicative of an intention of the parties to contract for the entire services of the employee to the exclusion of all other work. The employer's acquiescence[57] or objection, where followed by the employee's promise to discontinue the practice,[58] may amount to a practical construction of the employment contract by the parties themselves.

Adverse interest of employee. An employee is under an implied obligation not to act in the same matter both for himself and his employer, where their interests are adverse.[59] Where a salesman agrees to give his entire time and energy to the employer and agrees to carry no side lines of any character, he breaches the contract by engaging in a competitive outside interest.[60] The mere planning by an employee to engage in a competing business with his employer at the expiration of his term of employment ordinarily is not improper.[61]

§ 71. —— Earnings from Third Persons

Except for his compensation, the earnings of an employee in the course of, or in connection with, his services belong to the employer.

By express provision of the statutes in some jurisdictions, everything acquired by an employee by virtue of his employment except his compensation belongs to his employer;[62] even in the absence of a statutory provision, the earnings of an employee in the course of, or in connection with, his services belong to the master,[63] and the employer may enforce his rights to profits or earnings of the employee where the contract of hire provides that he shall have a fixed interest therein.[64] Where, however, the circumstances are such that the employee is not bound to serve the employer exclusively, his earnings in other employment wherein his employer's rights or interests are not affected belong to him,[65] even though under the terms of the employment contract the employee is required to give all of his time to his employer's business.[66]

Acquiescence by employer. The employer's knowledge of, and acquiescence in, his employee's practice of taking on outside work on his own account may establish the employee's right to his earnings from that source.[67]

§ 72. Trade Secrets

a. In general

b. Nature and proof of trade secrets and confidential relationship

a. In General

An employee is under an obligation during and after the termination of his employment not to divulge any of the trade secrets of his employer.

An employee is under an obligation, sometimes expressed in the employment contract,[71] and always implied where not expressed,[72] not to divulge any of the trade secrets of his employer, imparted to him in confidence. The duty of an employee not to use confidential information acquired in his employment is an absolute and not a relative duty.[73] Where no secret is imparted, there is no betrayal of confidence.[74] An employee, who learns in the course of, or by reason of, his employment that the premises where his employer's business is conducted are of peculiar value to his employer or one carrying on his business, has no right, without his employer's knowledge, to take a lease of those premises and hold them as his own to the injury of his employer's property.[75]

Termination and change of employment. Where an employee leaves his employer and goes elsewhere, he may lawfully use in his new employment knowledge gained in the old, provided only he does not disclose secret processes or confidential information involving, on his part, breach of faith or

Knowledge that employer desired secrecy

Duty of employee to maintain secrecy in regard to manufacturing process cannot be implied, in absence of other facts creating such duty, from employee's knowledge that employer wished process to be kept secret or that employee agreed that secrecy was desirable for welfare of company and even urged maintenance of secrecy.—New Method Die & Cut-Out Co. v. the violation of an agreement, express or implied.[76] In the absence of an express agreement, the duty of an employee not to disclose confidential information which he has gained in the course of his employment rests on an implied contract.[77] On the other hand, the employee may achieve superiority in his particular department by every lawful means at hand, and then, on the rightful termination of his contract for service, use that superiority for the benefit of himself or rivals in trade of his former employer.[78] The knowledge, experience, and efficiency which an employee obtains in his employment do not become the property of the employer[79] and they are not trade secrets.[80]

Protection and remedies. An employee, while he may be enjoined from committing threatened or continued disclosure of his employer's trade secrets, as considered in Injunctions § 148, or may be sued at law for damages for breach of the implied agreement not to divulge, as considered infra § 77, cannot be held in equity as a trustee of the wages he received from his employer to be recovered back in an action for an accounting if his employer's confidence in him is misplaced.[81]

b. Nature and Proof of Trade Secrets and Confidential Relationship

Trade secrets and confidential information, in order to be protected, must be the particular secrets of the employer as distinguished from the general secrets of the trade.

Trade secrets and confidential information, in order to be protected against disclosure by employees, must be the particular secrets of the employer as distinguished from the general secrets of the trade in which he is engaged.[82] Their character is not material, as long as they are peculiar and important to the employer's business and are used exclusively by him.[83] The courts have considered certain facts as having an important bearing on the question whether the secrets or information divulged was confidential and the business secrets of a particular employer to the exclusion of oth-

Real estate salesman

Knowledge of status of negotiations for sale of leasehold acquired by brokers' salesman in course of his agency was confidential and special, imposing on salesman active duty of full disclosure to brokers and rendering salesman liable to brokers for share of commissions received by him on consummation of sale after he left employment, notwithstanding salesman was not guilty of conscious purpose to defraud in failing to inform brokers of status of negotiations on severing employment.—Byrne v. ers,[84] as, for example, factory regulations excluding the public from the premises,[85] and forbidding employees to visit other rooms or departments in the factory than the one in which they are working,[86] or to inspect other machines than the ones they are working on,[87] and provisions made for the effective guarding of formulæ and ingredients.[88] The circumstances surrounding the condition of the business and the way it is carried on at the commencement of the employment period, and during its subsequent development and growth, are frequently considered by the courts as having an important bearing on the question whether the employer and employee regarded their relation to each other as a confidential one in which there should be no disclosure or improper use of the secrets of the business.[89] Facts considered by the courts of probative value in this connection are the employee's holding of a position of trust and confidence,[90] the habit of communicating to, or withholding from, him details of the business, especially matters of a confidential nature,[91] and his supervision of tests of secret processes.[92]

Particular trade secrets protected. Trade secrets within the rule prohibiting disclosure by an employee include secret processes of manufacture,[93] construction and operation of particular machinery,[94] advertising material,[95] business codes,[96] and business records,[97] even though kept by the employee in a so-called personal file.[98] The contents of a patent claim when filed in the Patent Office are not secret or confidential.[99]

Information as to customers. It is usually held that an employee's knowledge of his employer's customers, acquired by him as an ordinary employee and not by virtue of any peculiar trust or confidence placed in him, is not a trade secret, and that, in the absence of an express prohibitory agreement, the employee on a change of employment may solicit such customers as long as he proceeds from his memory rather than by the unauthorized use of a list of customers.[1] No breach of implied contract arises merely because the names and addresses of the employer's customers were furnished to an employee in the expectation, not expressed to the employee, that he would not disclose or use the names except as an employee, where on the termination of the employment the employee does not take the list but from memory thereafter solicits the customers of his former employer.[2]

Where the knowledge which the employee possesses as to the names and addresses of his employer's customers is confidential information obtained by him in, and by reason of, the course of his employment with his employer, he may not solicit such customers.[3] It is generally agreed that an employee may not use a list of customers, or a copy thereof, made surreptitiously by him during his employment without the knowledge or consent of the employer, or a list compiled by, and belonging to, the employer and furnished to the employee in connection with his employment, at least where the list is a confidential one.[4] On the other hand, it has been held that, in the absence of an express contract, the use by a former employee of a customers' list is not improper where the names on the list were not derived from any confidential information and did not constitute a trade secret.[5]

Improvements on appliances, etc., used in business
Employment by another does not prevent employee from making improvements on appliances and machinery used in business and obtaining patents therefor.—National Development Co. v. Gray, 55 N.E.2d 783, 316 Mass. 240, 153 A.L.R. 973—Hoyt v. Corporon, 16 N.E. 94, 268 Mass. 544.

Wrongful appropriation by employer
Where automobile muffler manufacturer filed application for patent on muffler invented by manufacturer's salesman without knowledge of salesman, prior arrangement between parties under which manufacturer agreed to test the muffler, manufacture it, and compensate salesman for mufflers manufactured, was vitiated, and rights of salesman in device were appropriated by manufacturer.—McNamara v. Expectation of improvement
Where employee was employed, not in hope he would invent new machine or new mechanical movement, but with the expectation that he would improve washing machine which company was then manufacturing, an obligation on part of employee to assign a valuable patent could be imported into employment contract only by some positive act or stipulation.—Barlow & Seelig Mfg. Co. v. Patch, 286 N.W. 577, 232 Wis. 220.

Securing patent at expense of employer by employee will not vest employer with title.—Deane v. Hodge, 27 N.W. 917, 35 Minn. 146, 59 Am.R. 321.

Use of employer's name in writing to patent attorneys with respect to patenting an invention was not inconsistent with employee's refusal to surrender his rights as inventor to employer, in view of doctrine of shop rights.—Barlow & Seelig Mfg. Co. v. Patch, 286 N.W. 577, 232 Wis. 220.

14. Mass.—American Circular Loom Co. v. Wilson, 84 N.E. 133, 198 Mass. 182, 126 Am.S.R. 409.

Fiduciary relationship. The employer may be entitled to the invention of the employee or the patent thereon where the employee occupies a relationship of trust and confidence to the employer.[15] The fact that the employee holds an important office or position in the corporation which employs him has been held under the circumstances in some cases to establish a trust relation making it inequitable for him to retain the title to an invention which really belongs to his employer.[16] The holding of such a position is not conclusive,[17] and, if an employee under the other circumstances of the case is entitled to ownership of his invention as against the corporation which employs him, the mere holding of one of its important positions will not operate to defeat his title.[18]

b. Contracts Vesting Ownership in Employer

(1) In general

(2) Employee hired to make invention

(1) In General

Pursuant to an agreement between the employer and employee, the employer may be entitled to the employee's inventions or discoveries made during the term of employment.

By express agreement between the employer and employee, the employer may be entitled to the employee's inventions or discoveries made during the term of the employment;[19] or the provisions of the contract[20] or the nature and circumstances of the employment[21] may be such as to raise an implication of an agreement to that effect. The contract need not be in writing or contain formal words of agreement;[22] but fraud on the part of the employer vitiates the contract.[23] General rules governing consideration for the execution of contracts apply

General instructions of employer

Where employee assigned numerous patents to employer pursuant to general instructions that patentable ideas and devices belong to employer and should be formally assigned to it, employee understood purport of instructions and assented to obligation to assign patentable inventions to employer.—New Jersey Zinc Co. v. Singmaster, C.C.A.N.Y., 71 F.2d 277, certiorari denied Singmaster v. New Jersey Zinc Co., 55 S.Ct. 106, 293 U.S. 591, 79 L.Ed. 685.

23. What constitutes fraud

Where employer's bonus plan was part consideration for employee's agreement that inventions should become employer's property, but employee never inquired respecting details of plan, employer was not to agreements in contracts of employment whereby the employee agrees that inventions made by him during the term of employment shall belong, or be assigned, to the employer.[24]

Where the contract requires that the employee assign to his employer the inventions made by him during his employment, the employer is entitled to a disclosure and an assignment of such inventions, but the employer may not require the employee to apply for a patent on an invention.[25] Where the employee has obtained a patent for the invention, the employer is entitled to an assignment of the patent[26] on payment of the expenses incurred by the employee in procuring the patent,[27] even though application for the patent had been made by the employee after the termination of his employment.[28] Where the employee has been paid his wages in full, he may not plead the insolvency of his employer as a defense to executing a transfer of his inventions to the employer according to the contract.[29]

Validity of agreement. A provision in an employment contract under which the employer shall have a right to the employee's inventions is not contrary to public policy[30] unless the provision is limitless in extent of time and in subject matter of invention.[31] Where the contract stipulations are capable of being construed separately, a provision requiring the assignment to the employer of all inventions discovered by the employee during the term of his employment may be sustained, notwithstanding the invalidity of other provisions which are limitless in extent of time and in subject matter of invention.[32]

Construction of agreement. General rules governing the construction of contracts ordinarily apply in construing agreements of employees vesting ownership of their inventions in the employer or requiring their assignment.[33] Such a provision must be interpreted in the light of its phraseology, as a part of the entire instrument in which it is contained, and in connection with the purposes to be accomplished and the surrounding circumstances.[34] The agreement will be strictly construed as against the employer,[35] particularly where such construction is in accordance with the conduct of the parties.[36]

The employer is entitled to such inventions of the employee, or to an assignment of the patents thereon, as come within the terms of the agreement.[37]

Inventions made before or after term

Where the product invented by an employee is sought to be appropriated by the employer under an agreement to assign, the language of the agreement must be clear and show an unmistakable intention that the particular matter covered by the invention or patent is within the intention of the parties.[38] Contracts referring in express terms or by implication to inventions or improvements connected with a limited class of machines, while enforceable as far as that class is concerned,[39] are held not to apply to inventions of another kind not named or implied in the contract,[40] or to inventions connected with machines generally which are used in that particular trade,[41] even though the contract contains other provisions of a general nature requiring the employee to work for the employer in every way that he can[42] and even though the invention was in a line of manufacture taken on by the employer as a regular part of his business subsequent to the making of the contract.[43]

If the employment contract is not restricted to inventions along a particular line, but in terms covers all inventions made by the employee during the term of employment, the employer has an equitable title in all his employee's inventions made during the term,[44] even though the employee worked on them out of business hours.[45] Inventions specifically excepted in the contract do not belong to the employer.[46] of employment see infra subdivision c of this section.

Inventions prior to agreement

"During term of employment" within agreement by employee to transfer to employer any inventions "now known", discovered, or made by employee, either in whole or in part, during term of employment, referred to employment prior to as well as after the date of the agreement.—United Aircraft Products v. Warrick, 72 N.E.2d 669, 70 Ohio App. 165.

What invention consisted of must be ascertained from examination of all claims, as well as specifications of patent subsequently granted him.—New Jersey Zinc Co. v. "Patentable ideas"

(1) Phrase "patentable ideas" in employer's instruction to assign such ideas of employees to employer did not mean complete inventions on which patents would issue; meaning of word "idea" is not confined to arts, machines, manufactures or compositions of matter and reduction to practice is unnecessary to constitute "patentable idea."—New Jersey Zinc Co. v. Inventions started before employment

(1) Where manufacturer and engineer entered into written contract whereby engineer agreed that all new inventions pertaining to truck which he conceived during life of contract should belong to manufacturer except any invention which had already been "started," court in determining meaning of quoted word had right to take into consideration business in which both contracting parties were engaged at time of execution of contract as well as business which it was contemplated should be continued.—Kysor v. Alma Motor Co., supra.

(2) In interpretation of a contract whereby an engineer agreed that all new inventions conceived by him during life of contract should belong to manufacturer of four wheel drive trucks, except any invention "started" before execution of contract, quoted word may be defined as beginning of a course of action which, if followed to a conclusion of original, logical conception, would lead to perfected product, completion of a mechanical unit adapted for practical utilization in application of power from generating plant of motor truck to turn each of four wheels thereof.—Kysor v. Alma Motor Co., supra.

(2) Employee Hired to Make Invention

Where an employee is hired to secure certain defined results, the employer has an equitable title as against the employee to the particular inventions the employee was engaged to perfect.

It has been almost universally held that, where one is employed in experimental work to secure certain defined results, the employer has an equitable title as against his employee to the particular inventions the employee was hired to perfect[47] even though the contract of employment does not specifically so provide;[48] and the employee in such case is bound to assign to his employer any patent obtained.[49] The government as an employer stands in the same position in this respect as any other employer;[50] the fact the United States does not desire a monopoly in the invention is not sufficient to deny its right to the invention of a government employee.[51] It is not necessary that the word "invention" be used in the employment agreement in order to constitute it an employment to make an invention.[52]

It has been held that the right of the employer to the invention or discovery of the employee depends, not on the terms of the original contract of hiring, but on the nature of the service in which the employee is engaged at the time he makes the discovery or invention, and arises, not out of the terms of the contract of hiring, but out of the duty which the employee owes to his employer with respect to the service in which he is engaged.[53]

c. Inventions or Patents before or after Term of Employment

Unless otherwise provided by agreement, an employee's inventions made before the commencement, or after the termination, of his employment belong to him.

In the absence of any contract stipulation to the contrary, an employee's inventions belong to him when they are made before the commencement[54] or after the termination[55] of his employment. However, an express provision of a contract may cover inventions made after the term of the employment.[56] Such provisions have been sustained as against the objection that they offend public policy,[57] although the law does not look with special favor on such provisions.[58] Where the circumstances give rise to an equitable title in the employer to the inventions of the employee, the fact that the patent issues or application therefor is filed after the employee has left his employment is not material.[59]

Where an employee is hired for a year under a written employment contract containing an agreement to assign to the employer any inventions made during the year following the cessation of his employment, and on the expiration of the written contract of employment the employee continues at will in the service of his employer, the agreement refers to the year immediately following the termination of the written contract of employment and not to the cessation of employment several years later as an employee at will.[60] A provision requiring the assignment by the employee of inventions made by the employee after the termination of his employment is inoperative where it depends on the happening of conditions which never occur[61] or the employer releases any claim to such inventions.[62]

d. License or Shop Right of Employer

The employer may be entitled to a license or shop right for the use of his employee's invention either as a result of an agreement or because the employer's time, tools, or material were employed in conceiving and perfecting the invention.

The employee may confer on the employer a license or "shop right" for the use of the invention by express agreement,[63] or by implication from the circumstances of the employment,[64] as by evidence disclosing an employment without formal agreement, a use by the employee of his employer's property and the services of his coemployees, and an assent by the employee to the employer's use of the invention.[65] The government is entitled, in the

During the period that he is so engaged, he is 'employed to invent,' and the results of his efforts at invention belong to his employer in the same way as would the product of his efforts in any other direction."—Houghton v. Improvements

Although basic patent was assignable to former employer of inventor under contract requiring assignment of all patentable inventions to employer, because invention was conceived before termination of employment, patents on improvements made or discovered after termination of employment were not assignable to former employer, since basic patent and improvement patents constituted separable and independent inventions.—New Jersey Zinc Co. v. Singmaster, C.C.A.N.Y., 71 F.2d 277, certiorari denied Singmaster v. New Jersey Zinc Co., 55 S.Ct. 106, 293 U. S. 591, 79 L.Ed. 685.

Employee who repeatedly refused to assign his patent to employer or to give patent to employer as a "suggestion" or to enter into any arrangements giving employer rights in patent until employee knew what he was going to get for patent, conferred no shop right in patent on employer.—Heywood-Wakefield Co. v. same way and to the same extent as a private employer, to shop rights.[66] Where there exists no agreement between the master and servant, the right of the master is based on equitable principles; since the servant uses his master's time, facilities, and materials to attain a concrete result, the master is entitled in equity to use that which embodies his own property and to duplicate it as often as he may find occasion to employ similar appliances in his business.[67]

The employment, however, does not, of itself, import a license to use the employee's invention.[68] A shop right in favor of the employer does not arise where in conceiving and perfecting the invention the employee does not use the employer's time, tools, or materials[69] or where the parties have agreed on a royalty basis.[70] A shop right cannot come into existence unless the inventor was an employee of the one claiming the right at the time when the invention was made and reduced to practice;[71] but it has also been held that a shop right is not restricted alone to the case of an employer-employee relationship.[72] The scope of a shop right must be determined from the nature of the employer's business, the character of the invention involved, the circumstances which created it, and the relation, conduct, and intention of the parties.[73] The shop right has been held nonassignable.[74]

Effect of license for exclusive use. The right of the employer under the license may be extended by its terms to an exclusive use of the employee's invention.[75] Under such provision the employee cannot make a valid assignment of the patent to the employer's competitor in trade.[76]

Statutory regulations. Prior to the application by the employee for a patent the employer may be entitled to a license to use the employee's invention under the federal statute, 35 U.S.C.A. § 48, providing that every person who purchases of the inventor, or discoverer, or with his knowledge and consent constructs any newly invented or discovered machine, or other patentable article, prior to the application by the inventor or discoverer for a patent, or who sells or uses one so constructed, shall have the right to use, and vend to others to be used, the specific thing so made or purchased, without liability therefor.[77]

e. Compensation of Employee for Inventions or Use Thereof

Pursuant to agreement between an employer and employee, the employee may be entitled to additional compensation for his inventions or for the use thereof.

Where the inventions of the employee equitably belong to the employer or are assigned to him under principles considered supra subdivisions b, c of this section, the employee is not entitled to compensation in addition to the regular wages received[78] unless there exists an agreement between the parties for such extra compensation,[79] such as royalties.[80] The employee is entitled to reasonable com-

"The scope of an implied license is to be determined by the circumstances out of which it arises, including the relation and conduct of the parties in connection with the business in the development of which the employer's money was expended in making the invention operative, and all the other circumstances upon which agreement may be implied or estoppel enforced."—Tin Decorating Co. of Baltimore v. Metal Package Corporation, D.C.N.Y., 29 F.2d 1006, 1007, affirmed, C.C.A., 37 F.2d 5, certiorari denied 50 S.Ct. 410, 281 U.S. 759, 74 L.Ed. 1168.

License to use improved machines

Inventor's license to employer was not limited to first machine constructed by it, but to extend to as many improved machines as were reasonably necessary for its business.—Tin Decorating Co. of Baltimore v. Metal Package Corporation, D.C.N.Y., 29 F.2d 1006, affirmed, C.C.A., 37 F.2d 5, certiorari denied 50 S.Ct. 410, 281 U.S. 759, 74 L.Ed. 1168.

Per cent of net profits from sales

(1) Contract between mechanical engineer and company employing him, for assignment of invention, providing that as additional remuneration for patents that might be issued, company agreed to pay engineer, in addition to his salary, specified per cent of net profits from sale of invention or patent or the right to use the same, entitled engineer to accounting for sales by company of annealing furnaces embodying patent on invention by engineer which were manufactured by company and installed for use by others.—Sylvester v. Simplex Engineering Co., 192 A. 125, 326 Pa. 235.

(2) Under agreement whereby employer took option to purchase employee's inventions on method of concentrating ore by flotation, and if employee's "reagents, modified oils or other chemicals" could be profitably manufactured "as a patented flotation oil or reagent," to arrange for manufacture thereof and pay employee specified per cent "of the net profits received by the company therefrom," employer was liable for such per cent only on manufacturing profits from sale of materials, not on royalties collected for licenses of flotation process invented by employee.—Martin v. Minerals Separation North American Corporation, D.C.Md., 29 F.Supp. 146.

N.J.—Oliver v. Autographic Register Co., 177 A. 680, 118 N.J.Eq. 72, affirmed 183 A. 171, 119 N.J.Eq. 481.

Obligation to license another

(1) Under contract providing that if inventor's employer decides not to employ inventions assigned to employer, it would license another to make the inventions and pay to inventor a specified portion of the royalties, decision of the employer not to employ the inventions was a "condition precedent" to requiring employer to license another to make the inventions.—Trask v. Mills Novelty Co., D.C.Ill., 52 F.Supp. 723.

(2) Where contract requiring inventor's employer deciding not to employ inventions assigned to employer to license another manufacturer set forth no condition under which the license was to be granted other than the royalties to be paid to inventor, the law implied the condition that the terms of such license must be reasonable and employer's refusal to consider proposed license agreement containing provisions for pensation under an agreement requiring the employer to make reasonable recognition to the employee for inventions turned over to the employer.[81]

The employee is entitled to compensation for the employer's use of his inventions where the employer agrees to pay compensation or such is the understanding between the parties;[82] and it has been held that if the employer under a license, express or implied, uses his employee's invention, there is an implied promise on his part to pay his employee for its use, independent of, and in addition to, the amount due under the employment contract as wages.[83] The employee is not entitled to compensation from his employer for the use of his inventions where in express terms he has given his employer the free use of his invention[84] or by his conduct has indicated his acquiescence in its use without payment therefor.[85]

Where the employer is entitled to a shop right in the invention of his employee under the principles considered supra subdivision d of this section, the employee is not, in the absence of agreement, entitled to royalties or other compensation for the use of the invention by the employer.[86] An officer of a corporation is not entitled to royalties under a patent issued in his name where the patent belongs to the corporation and is held by the officer as trustee.[87]

f. Actions

Various actions and proceedings have been instituted in connection with employees' inventions and patents thereon, such as suits or actions by the employee to cancel an assignment or to recover compensation or actions by the employer to compel the assignment of the invention or patent thereon.

Various actions or proceedings may be brought in connection with inventions made by employees and the patents granted thereon,[88] such as a suit for the infringement of a patent[89] or a suit by an employee to rescind or cancel a contract to assign, cancellation by proposed licensee on sixty days' notice without any right to employer to cancel was warranted.—Trask v. Mills Novelty Co., supra.

(3) Where inventor and his employer had contributed to inventions which were assigned to employer and contract requiring employer to license others to manufacture inventions if it decided not to employ inventions or discontinued use thereof set forth the royalty to be paid to inventor, employer and inventor were entitled to reasonable protection in any proposed licensing agreement.—Trask v. Mills Novelty Co., supra.

Reasonable compensation

Inventions consisting of bobbin controlling adjunct and bossed disc patents which employee turned over to employer, which inventions brought and held profitable customers for employer, mill and machine shop owner, in shoe trade, had reasonable value of five thousand dollars and employee was entitled to such sum, together with interest thereon from date of writ.—Corthell v. or an assignment of, an invention, or patent thereon, to the employer or to compel a reassignment.[90] Cancellation or reassignment may not be obtained where there is an adequate remedy at law.[91] In suits to cancel or rescind or to compel a reassignment, the general rules in civil actions ordinarily apply with respect to pleadings[92] and evidence.[93]

Actions to recover compensation. In a proper case an employee may maintain an action to recover compensation from his employer for the use or assignment of his inventions or patents thereon.[94] In defense to an action by an employee for compensation various matters have been urged,[95] such as laches.[96] A tender of a reassignment by the employer to the employee which reserves shop rights to the employer does not constitute a defense to an action for the value of the invention or patent rights assigned.[97] The general rules in civil actions ordinarily are applicable with respect to pleading,[98] evidence,[99] including its admissibility[1] and weight and sufficiency,[2] and such general

In engineer's action against motor truck manufacturer to secure reassignment of certain patent applications, allegations of complaint charging that plaintiff had been induced to assign patents by false representations and pretenses of defendant were sufficient, if proved, to entitle plaintiff to a rescission of assignments.—Kysor v. Alma Motor Co., 287 N.W. 385, 290 Mich. 76.

(1) To support finding or judgment for employer.—Hebbard v. American Zinc, Lead & Smelting Co., C.C.A.Mo., 161 F.2d 339—Bowen v. B. F. Goodrich Co., C.C.A.Ohio, 36 F. 2d 306.

(2) In action to have declared void an agreement entered into by plaintiff with defendant institute conferring royalty rights on defendant with reference to invention conceived by plaintiff while in employ of defendant, either on ground of want of consideration or on ground of fraud in the inducement, evidence supported judgment for plaintiff.—Simmons v. 96. Matters constituting laches

(1) Employee's action to recover just compensation from employer for use of employee's invented devices for many years was not barred by laches where there was no showing that delay prejudiced employer and complaint alleged that delay was due as much to employer as to employee.—Cool v. International Shoe Co., C.C.A.Mo., 142 F.2d 318.

(2) Employee's action to recover compensation for employer's use of employee's invented devices was not barred by laches where complaint did not disclose that cause of action accrued at any particular time and defendant did not request plaintiff to state the time at which compensation became due or date on which cause of action accrued.—Cool v. International Shoe Co., supra.

1. Evidence held admissible

(1) In action on implied contract for reasonable value of inventions and patent rights assigned, proof of reasonable royalties was admissible and entitled to be considered by jury as element in arriving at value.—General Paint Corporation v. Kramer, supra.

(2) In salesman's action against his master for compensation for advertising idea invented by salesman, involving use of advertising sound car, testimony of master's officials that use of master's trade-mark on sound car had been discussed many years before salesman was employed, and that they were familiar with such type of advertising years before salesman claimed to have evolved the idea was admissible.—Salon v. W. M. Finck & Co., 4 N.W.2d 469, 302 Mich. 65.

(3) In action to recover reasonable value of use of certain inventive ideas disclosed by employee to an agent of employer in expectation of payment, patents obtained by employee after disclosure of inventive ideas to employer's agent were properly admitted as part of history of events between parties taken pursuant to agent's direction and plan of retaining the benefit to employer alone.—Matarese v. Moore-McCormack Lines, C.C.A.N.Y., 158 F.2d 631.

2. Evidence held sufficient

(1) To support findings that employee was under no contractual duty to make inventions for employer and that no custom existed requiring employees to assign their patents to employer.—Howard v. Howe, C.C.A.Ill., 61 F.2d 577, certiorari denied 53 S.Ct. 527, 289 U.S. 731, 77 L.Ed. 1480.

(3) In suit by mechanical engineer against employer for accounting for profits from sale of annealing furnaces, allegedly due under contract for per cent of profits from sale of right to use of invention or patent, evidence sustained finding that engineer was coinventor of patented annealing furnace sold by employer.—Sylvester v. Simplex Engineering Co., 192 A. 125, 326 Pa. 235.

(4) Other evidence.—Matarese v. Moore-McCormack Lines, C.C.A.N.Y., 158 F.2d 631—Dysart v. Remington Rand, D.C.Conn., 40 F.Supp. 596.

Evidence held insufficient

(1) To establish that employer agreed to pay employee any commission for right to use patent covering invention relating to Jacob's ladder.—Salterini v. Schneider, 45 N. Y.S.2d 645.

rules ordinarily are applicable to trial,[3] damages,[4] and review.[5]

Actions by employers to recover employee's inventions. Where the employer claims the ownership of inventions made by the employee or of patents thereon, as considered supra subdivisions b, c of this section, by appropriate remedy he may establish his ownership and compel the employee to assign the inventions or patents thereon.[6] Various matters have been urged in defense to such actions,[7] such as estoppel[8] or laches.[9] A contract providing for the assignment of the employee's inventions to his employer will not be enforced in

(3) To sustain defenses of fraud and estoppel, based on employee's failure to make an issue of his patent claim when defendant purchased assignor's assets.—Dysart v. Remington Rand, supra.

(4) To sustain employer's claim to invention by way of shop right, license, or equitable or legal title based on employee's position as an officer of employer when invention was made.—Dysart v. Remington Rand, D.C.Conn., 40 F.Supp. 596.

(5) Letter of patentee to employer's president inviting employer to buy rights in the patents so that patentee would be relieved of embarrassment as to licensing nearby competitors was insufficient to prove contract of employer to pay royalties.—Dovel v. Sloss-Sheffield Steel & Iron Co., C.C.A.Ala., 139 F.2d 36, certiorari denied 64 S.Ct. 1057, 322 U.S. 740, 88 L.Ed. 1573.

U.S.—Matarese v. Moore-McCormack Lines, C.C.A.N.Y., 158 F.2d 631.

Instructions

In action for compensation for use of certain inventions disclosed by employee to employer's agent in expectation of payment, court properly charged that recovery must be based on reasonable value of use of the devices and reasonable value of services rendered by employee.—Matarese v. Moore-McCormack Lines, supra.

Profits realized from sales

Where automobile muffler manufacturer and his successor attempted to deprive manufacturer's salesman of invention of improved automobile muffler and as part of such scheme manufacturer filed application for patent which resulted in litigation which terminated in favor of salesman, manufacturer and successor were liable to account to salesman for profits realized from sale of mufflers by manufacturer and successor, from date on which muffler was wrongfully appropriated to date on which patent was issued to salesman.—McNamara v. Powell, supra.

Excessiveness

In action for reasonable value of use of certain inventive ideas regarding cargo loading and unloading apparatus disclosed by employee to employer's agent in expectation of payment, an award of forty thousand dollars was not excessive under evidence.—Matarese v. Moore-McCormack Lines, C.C.A.N.Y., 158 F.2d 631.

Expenses of litigation

In action by employee on contract for invention of motor accessories, decision that employee was entitled to recover royalties on carburetors sold, but not unearned minimum royalties, was affirmed by divided court.—Carter v. Marvel Carburetor Co., 248 N.W. 545, 263 Mich. 48, certiorari denied Marvel Carburetor Co. v. Carter, 54 S.Ct. 92, 290 U.S. 673, 78 L.Ed. 581.

Specific performance to compel assignment of patents see the C.J.S. title Specific Performance § 67, also 58 C.J. p 1038 note 73 et seq.

Invention not patentable

Where defendant orally contracted to assign to plaintiff all rights to any patentable invention or device he was employed to work on, or application not yet acted on by the patent office, but had not agreed to refrain from divulging any secret process of the plaintiff, defendant, and defendant company organized by him could not be restrained from using his inventions, not patentable for lack of novelty, and which could be easily seen and copied, since an assignment thereof would give no rights.—Shur-Loc Elevator Safety Co. v. Purcell, 188 N.Y.S. 25, 196 App. Div. 546.

Conditions precedent

Tender of balance due employee by employer for assignment of patent applications was not required before suit to compel assignment, where employee revoked plaintiff's attorney's power of attorney to prepare applications and denied rights claimed by plaintiff before issuance of patents.—Tennessee Copper & Chemical Corporation v. Martin, D. C.N.J., 4 F.Supp. 38, affirmed, C.C.A., Martin v. Tennessee Copper & Chemical Corporation, 66 F.2d 187, certiorari denied 54 S.Ct. 120, 290 U.S. 683, 78 L.Ed. 588.

7. U.S.—Pure Oil Co. v. Hyman, C. C.A.Ill., 95 F.2d 22.

8. Matters constituting estoppel

(1) Where defendant, while employed by plaintiff, agreed to assign to plaintiff any patents which he might make in rust-proofing of metals, and called plaintiff's attention to a rusticide process invented by him, and was willing to turn it over to plaintiff, and plaintiff gave defendant to understand plaintiff did not want it, and defendant entered into engagement with others, plaintiff was estopped to insist on assignment of such patent.—Parker Rust-Proof Co. v. Allen, 203 N.W. 890, 231 Mich. 69.

(2) Plaintiff is estopped to claim inventions of a former employee by causing an interference to be declared between claims of employee's patents and claims of an application for reissue of a patent in which it was interested.—Pure Oil Co. v. Hyman, C.C.A.Ill., 95 F.2d 22.

(3) Fact that employee, who agreed that inventions should be employer's property, submitted to superior, possessing no final authority, his plan, drawings, and report respecting invention, which superior studied and returned with criticisms, did not show rejection of invention which would estop employer to require assignment of patent obtained by employee after leaving employment.—Du Pont Rayon Co. v. Paley, D.C.Ill., 4 F.Supp. 290, affirmed, C. C.A., Paley v. Du Pont Rayon Co., 71 F.2d 856.

Mass.—Hoyt v. Corporon, 168 N.E. 94, 268 Mass. 544.

Delay in prosecuting patent application

Corporation suing its former employee for assignment of patent was not at fault in failing to prosecute application for patent within reasonable time, in absence of full revelation of facts to it.—New Jersey Zinc Co. v. Singmaster, 4 F.Supp. 967, modified on other grounds, C.C.A., 71 F.2d 277, certiorari denied Singmaster v. New Jersey Zinc Co., 55 S.Ct. 106, 293 U.S. 591, 79 L.Ed. 685.

equity where the employer is himself in default.[10] Where the employee refuses to execute an assignment on request of the employer at a time when the employer was not in default, the subsequent bankruptcy of the employer constitutes no defense.[11]

The general rules in civil actions ordinarily apply with respect to evidence,[12] including its admissibility[13] and weight and sufficiency,[14] and also with 11. U.S.—Conway v. White, C.C.A. Conn., 292 F. 837.

12. Presumptions
Sales manager's interest and assistance in procuring patents for employer did not warrant presumption of contract to transfer patents to employer.—Amdyco Corporation v. Urquhart, D.C.Pa., 39 F.2d 943, affirmed, C.C.A., 51 F.2d 1072, certiorari denied 52 S.Ct. 265, 284 U.S. 689, 76 L.Ed. 582.

Burden of proof
(1) In suit to compel employee to assign patent to employer, employer had burden of proving claim that employee was engaged to develop the patented device.—Gear Grinding Mach. Co. v. Stuber, 276 N.W. 514, 282 Mich. 455.

(2) Where employee was employed, not in hope he would invent new machine or new mechanical movement, but to improve washing machine which company was then manufacturing, burden was on company to prove that relationship of parties was changed by their subsequent conduct so as to entitle company to invention of employee.—Barlow & Seelig Mfg. Co. v. Patch, 286 N.W. 577, 232 Wis. 220.

(3) In suit against former laboratory employee to compel assignment of an inventor's interest in an application for a patent on a flexible fluid seal for use in automobile engines, employer had burden of proving a clear and specific contract of assignment covering former employee's interest in his invention.—Crane Packing Co. v. Brummer, 67 N.E.2d 892, 329 Ill.App. 272.

13. Evidence held admissible
Evidence of judge's opinion that corporation could claim patent for improvement of process was inadmissible, where rendered after relations were entered into.—North v. Atlas Brick Co., Tex.Civ.App., 281 S.W. 608, modified on other grounds Atlas Brick Co. v. North, Com.App., 288 S.W. 146.

Evidence held inadmissible
Testimony as to when witness heard that manager claimed patent adversely to corporation was immaterial.—North v. Atlas Brick Co., Tex.Civ.App., 281 S.W. 608, modified on other grounds Atlas Brick Co. v. North, Com.App., 288 S.W. 146.

14. Prior assignments
The fact that employee had assigned other patents or inventions to employer is some evidence of existence of agreement to assign all inventions, but not conclusive.—Bowers v. Woodman, D.C.Mass., 59 F.2d 797.

Evidence held sufficient
(1) In general.—Grip Nut Co. v. Sharp, C.C.A.Ill., 150 F.2d 192, certiorari denied Sharp v. Grip Nut Co., 66 S.Ct. 55, 326 U.S. 742, 90 L.Ed. 443.

(2) To establish alleged representations by principal's agent in respect of protection of employees on inventions.—St. Louis & O'Fallon Coal Co. v. Dinwiddie, D.C.Md., 53 F.2d 655, affirmed, C.C.A., Dinwiddie v. St. Louis & O'Fallon Coal Co., 64 F.2d 303.

(3) To establish that discoveries were made by employees in course of employment and in connection with employment.—St. Louis & O'Fallon Coal Co. v. Dinwiddie, D.C. Md., 53 F.2d 655, affirmed, C.C.A., Dinwiddie v. St. Louis & O'Fallon Coal Co., 64 F.2d 303.

(4) To show or sustain finding that employee's invention or patent thereon belonged to employer.
Mich.—Gear Grinding Mach. Co. v. Stuber, 276 N.W. 514, 282 Mich. 455.

(6) To show that defendant, in employing inventor who had previously been employed by plaintiff, acted in good faith and in belief employee had right to leave plaintiff's employment.—National Cash Register Co. v. Remington Arms Co., 209 N.Y.S. 40, 212 App.Div. 343, affirmed 151 N.E. 144, 242 N.Y. 99, reargument denied 152 N.E. 431, 242 N.Y. 569.

(7) To show that invention had been completed before defendant entered plaintiff's employ.—Sharples v. McCornack, 99 A. 153, 254 Pa. 535.

(8) To support findings that inventions were conceived after employment terminated.—Pure Oil Co. v. Hyman, C.C.A.Ill., 95 F.2d 22.

(9) To sustain finding that employee was released from contract reserving to employer inventions.—National Cash Register Co. v. Remington Arms Co., 151 N.E. 144, 242 N.Y. 99, reargument denied 152 N.E. 431, 242 N.Y. 569.

(10) To sustain finding that employee, while in position of trust, unlawfully appropriated to her own use idea for patent belonging to plaintiffs and supported conclusion that employee committed breach of trust by obtaining a patent thereon. —Transparent Ruler Co. v. C-Thru Ruler Co., 28 A.2d 232, 129 Conn. 369.

(4) To show that inventions made by government employees and claimed by government covered matters assigned for research.—U. S. v. Dubilier Condenser Corporation, C.C. A.Del., 59 F.2d 381, affirmed 53 S.Ct. 554, 289 U.S. 178, 77 L.Ed. 1114, 85 A.L.R. 1488, amended 53 S.Ct. 687, 289 U.S. 706, 77 L.Ed. 1462.

respect to trial and judgment.[15]

§ 74. Property, Mineral Deposits, Etc., Found by Employee

The employee is entitled to property, mineral deposits, etc., which he has found by his own efforts, unless there exists an obligation to the contrary based either on contract or on circumstances disclosing a confidential or trust relationship between him and his employer.

Questions of title as between employer and employee involving ownership rights in mines and mineral claims are governed by the principles of law applicable to the ownership of the inventions and discoveries of the employee; the employee is entitled to the fruit of his own efforts in the absence of an obligation to the contrary based either on a contract, express or implied, or on circumstances disclosing a confidential or other trust relationship between him and his employer.[16]

As considered in Finding Lost Goods § 5 d, an employee who finds a lost chattel while engaged in work for his employer is entitled thereto as against his employer if the latter is not the owner.

§ 75. Rules, Regulations, and Usages

An employee or servant is under the obligation to obey the reasonable rules and regulations imposed by the employer.

Subject to statutory provisions, an employer may make reasonable rules and regulations for the conduct of his business,[17] and an assumption is imported into the contract of employment that the servant will obey all reasonable rules and regulations incidental to the carrying out of the contract,[18] of which he has knowledge,[19] or of which he is chargeable with notice,[20] at the time the employment is entered into.

Rules which first come to the employee's notice after he has made his contract,[21] or which are not promulgated until after he has commenced work,[22] are not binding on him unless he accepts them as a part of his contract. Where the acceptance is given in advance of their promulgation, as where the contract provides in terms that the employee shall obey such rules and regulations as the employer shall afterward make, the employee is still not bound unless he receives notice of them.[23]

Employee's skill and care. The employee's use

U.S.—Lion Mfg. Corporation v. Chicago Flexible Shaft Co., C.C.A. Ill., 106 F.2d 930.

Findings

In former employer's action to compel assignment of patent trial judge's finding as to nature of former employee's work and the granting of relief to plaintiff were tantamount to finding that former employee was under implied obligation to assign patent to plaintiff.—National Development Co. v. Gray, 55 N.E.2d 783, 316 Mass. 240, 153 A.L.R. 973.

Judgment or decree

(1) Judgment requiring defendant to assign to plaintiff patents based on invention which was result of combined efforts of plaintiff's former employee and of three others, at great expense to defendant, and which did not infringe plaintiff's patent rights, was harsh and inequitable.—National Cash Register Co. v. Remington Arms Co., 209 N.Y.S. 40, 212 App.Div. 343, affirmed 151 N.E. 144, 242 N.Y. 99, reargument denied 152 N.E. 431, 242 N.Y. 569.

of skill and care does not relieve him of his obligation to comply with his employer's rules.[24]

§ 76. Corporal Punishment

An employer has no right under ordinary circumstances to inflict corporal punishment on an employee.

While a master has a limited right to inflict corporal punishment on one apprenticed to him, as considered in Apprentices § 17, an employer has no such right, under ordinary circumstances, over an employee,[25] even though the chastisement is in moderation[26] and by way of correction.[27] The right of the employer to chastise an employee is not enlarged by the circumstance of the employee being a minor,[28] or living in his household as a member of his family,[29] or having been hired to him by the employee's father, if he received no permission from the father to chastise,[30] or by statutes providing that violence to the person does not amount to assault and battery in the case of moderate correction by a parent of his child, a guardian of his ward, a master of his apprentice, and a teacher of his scholar,[31] or statutes requiring proprietors of manufacturing establishments to cause children in their employ to be taught to read and write and attend public worship.[32]

Delegation of right to chastise. The right to chastise an employee who is a minor may be delegated to the employer by the parents.[33] The right to delegate, however, is itself restricted to a delegation that is reasonable under the circumstances.[34] Even where there has been a proper delegation of the power to the employer, the employer in turn cannot delegate it to another.[35]

§ 77. Breach of Contract by Employee and Actions Therefor

The employee is liable to the employer for breach of the contract of employment unless the employer has waived the breach.

In the absence of a waiver of the breach, the employer may recover damages from his employee for leaving his employment in violation of the contract between them, as considered infra § 78, or for involving his employer in loss through his own negligence or wrongful act, as considered infra § 79, or generally for any failure to perform the duties devolving on him under the employment contract.[36] An employee's embezzlement of his employer's funds constitutes a breach of contract which goes to the very root of the subject matter of the contract of service.[37] In an action by an employer against an employee to recover damages to property arising out of breach of contract, where the element of negligence is not involved, recovery can be had only where the contract is breached.[38]

civil actions apply[39] as to trial.[40] Where former employees formed a corporation for the specific purpose of utilizing confidential information and secret processes filched from their employer, the corporation is liable for profits realized from the beginning of its corporate existence,[41] and, in determining profits, doubts as to deductible items should be resolved against the corporation and former employees.[42]

Waiver by employer. The employer may waive nonperformance by the employee.[43] If the employer consents to, or acquiesces in, the employee's unlawful act, the employee may defend himself on that ground against liability to his employer for loss resulting therefrom.[44] A continuance by the employer of an employee in his service, with knowledge of a breach of the employment contract, has been held to constitute a waiver;[45] but it has also been held that it is no defense that the employer merely accepted his employee's services after the commission of the unlawful act.[46]

§ 78. —— Action for Leaving Employment

An employee is liable to his employer in damages as a result of leaving his employer's business in violation of his agreement.

An employee who leaves his employer's business in violation of his agreement is liable to his employer in damages for the loss sustained.[47] Abandonment of the work is not in itself actionable.[48] In order to recover, the employer must show a contract obligating the employee to remain,[49] its violation by the employee,[50] and a resulting loss to the employer.[51] Also an employer may recover damages from an employee who leaves without notice, where the contract or rules of the employer, brought to the employee's notice, require him to give such notice.[52]

Defenses. The employee may show that the employer has so conducted himself as to make his position in the business unbearable, in violation of his implied undertaking not to do so,[53] unless he was

(2) Evidence, in action for price of newspapers sold to former carrier, filing claim in reconvention for sum customarily paid carriers for each subscriber remaining after they left plaintiff's employ, showed that defendant did not reasonably or fairly comply with condition precedent that he furnish route list to plaintiff.—Times-Picayune Pub. himself guilty of a breach before his position became unbearable.[54]

Proceedings. General rules ordinarily apply in actions against an employee for wrongfully leaving his employment,[55] as with respect to evidence.[56] The cost of replacing the services of an employee with those of another is sufficiently evidenced by the amount actually paid or agreed to be paid to the deserting employee.[57] Additional evidence as to the market cost of similar services, while admissible, is not necessary.[58]

Damages. Actual damages suffered by an employer from the employee's wrongful abandonment of his service may be recovered,[59] provided the employer has made every effort that can reasonably be required of him to fill the vacancy.[60] The measure of damages recoverable is the difference between the contract wage and the sum which the employer is required to pay to obtain someone else equally capable to fill the vacancy.[61] The authorities are in conflict as to whether the employer can also recover damages for injury to his property resulting from the employee's leaving, a recovery being allowed in some jurisdictions[62] and not in others.[63]

§ 79. Action for Negligence or Wrongful Act

An employee is liable in damages to his employer for his negligence or wrongful act resulting in loss to the employer.

Unless otherwise provided by statute,[64] an action for damages lies for the negligence or wrongful act of an employee resulting in loss to his employer.[65] The rule imposing liability on a servant for negligence or wrongful act in favor of his employer is applicable in the case of domestic servants,[66] including chauffeurs or drivers of vehicles.[67] On the other hand, no liability attaches to the employee if he uses the degree of care required under the circumstances in the performance of his duties[68] or if the loss to the employer is not the natural result of his act.[69]

Defenses. Various matters have been urged as defenses in actions by employers against employees for negligence or wrongful acts.[70] The employer may be barred from recovery because of his contributory negligence[71] or assumption of risk;[72] but the negligence of the servant is not imputed to the master so as to preclude recovery against the servant for negligence in injuring the person or property of the master.[73] An employee may defend in an action charging him with negligence by showing that the employer was himself guilty of negligence in furnishing a faulty plan or equipment or defective tools for the work,[74] unless the circumstances of the case were such as to require an added vigilance on his part after knowledge of the employer's negligence, and he failed to meet that requirement.[75] The employee cannot defend on the ground that his act was not willful[76] or that the negligent act of a fellow servant contributed to the loss,[77] although the fellow servant's negligence would be a good defense if it alone caused the injury, and the employee who is sued was in no way responsible for it.[78]

Pleading. The general rules governing pleadings in civil actions ordinarily are applicable in actions by an employer against an employee for negligence or wrongful act.[79] The employee is not entitled to affirmative relief where no such relief was prayed in the answer or leave asked to amend the answer so as to be entitled to such relief.[80]

Condonation

Subsequent employment of accountants to verify amount of defalcations of brokers' employee and to prepare claim against surety did not condone any prior negligence of accountants in previously auditing and examining brokers' books and accounts.—National Surety Corporation v. Action against chauffeur

Declaration in negligence action by automobile owner against his chauffeur was not demurrable in view of allegations that owner, although riding in automobile at time of collision, was exercising due care, and that automobile was not under his care and direction.—Darman v. Zilch, 186 A. 21, 56 R.I. 413, 110 A.L.R. 826.

In suit by corporation and its president for employee's breach of fiduciary relationship in applying for patent for machine which employee constructed through employment by corporation and through information imparted by president, wherein master found that invention was joint property of employee and president, employee's answer, which did not set up counterclaim, alleging that he owned machine and its design did not entitle him to affirmative relief against president so as to authorize court to enjoin president from selling more than undivided half interest in invention, where defendant at no time asked leave to amend answer.—George C.

Evidence. In an action by an employer against an employee for negligence or wrongful act, the general rules governing evidence in civil actions ordinarily are applicable.[81] In an action by an owner of an automobile against his chauffeur for negligence in the operation of the vehicle, the mere presence of the owner in the automobile at the time of the accident raises no presumption of law that the owner was guilty of contributory negligence.[82] The burden is on the employer to prove the employee's negligence or misconduct.[83] General rules also apply with respect to the admissibility[84] and the weight and sufficiency[85] of the evidence. For example, evidence is admissible to show the amount of additional business which would have been done if the employee had properly attended to his work.[86]

Trial. The general rules relating to trials in civil actions usually apply in an action by an employer against an employee for negligence or wrongful act.[87] It is for the jury to decide, under proper instructions as to the law, whether an employee in a particular case has used that degree of caution which a reasonably prudent person would exercise under the existing circumstances,[88] or whether he has been guilty of the conversion of his employer's funds,[89] or whether in any respect he has failed to perform his duties under the employment contract, where issues of fact are involved.[90] Whether an employee's earnings outside of his wages have been for services rendered in the course of, or in connection with, his employment, frequently involves a determination of issues of fact by a jury.[91] Contributory negligence of the employer ordinarily is a question of fact for the jury.[92] Where the owner of a motor vehicle operated by his chauffeur is in the vehicle at the time of the accident and retains the right and power to control the manner in which it is to be operated, then an issue of fact is raised as to whether the owner was guilty of contributory negligence.[93]

Damages. The items of loss to the employer for which the law allows a recovery against the employee and the amount of damages recoverable therefor, follow the rules of law relating to damages generally.[94] Where a mechanic injures the materials furnished him, or wastes them, he must

Labor-contract statutes which impose criminal liability on an employee for breach of a labor contract have been strictly construed.

Statutes, commonly known as the "labor-contract acts" and variously worded, have been enacted in several jurisdictions and in substance they have provided that the obtaining of money or other property by an employee from his employer on the strength of the employment contract, fraudulently intending not to do any work under the contract, and then failing or refusing to perform it or to repay the money or return the property without just cause, to the loss and damage of the employer, shall be punishable by fine or imprisonment,[98] or they have provided that, where any person shall entice or procure an employee unlawfully to leave his employer's service, such person and employee may be sued jointly or severally for damages, and may be subject to indictment for violating its provisions.[99] These statutes have been strictly construed.[1]

b. Validity of Statutes

Statutes attempting to penalize a mere breach of an employment contract have generally been held to be invalid.

Statutes attempting to penalize a mere breach of an employment contract have generally been held to be unconstitutional,[2] but where the essence of the offense defined is fraud a statute has been held constitutional[3] even though a contract or breach of contract is involved.[4] The United States supreme court has held that a labor contract statute violates the constitution where it punishes criminally the violation of a contract of labor on the faith of which money or goods have been advanced, and renders the refusal or failure on the part of the laborer to perform the labor contracted for without refunding the money or payment for the property received prima facie evidence of fraudulent intent

(2) Where employees after resigning entered into business in competition with employer, in determining employer's damages resulting from former employees' obtaining for their new company orders from employer's customers where overhead costs of employer were not materially decreased by loss of orders improperly procured and executed by former employees and employer's overhead costs would not have been materially increased if it had executed those orders, overhead costs were not to be considered.—F. A. Bartlett Tree Expert Co. v. Hartney, supra.

(3) Where employees after resigning entered into business in competition with former employer and improperly procured and executed orders from former employer's customers, loss which former employer sustained was difference between what it would actually have cost it to execute the orders and contract prices therefor, so that action of trial judge in awarding sum left after deducting from gross amount of orders the actual cost of performance of the work was not error.—F. A. Bartlett Tree Expert Co. v. Hartney, supra.

39 C.J. p 136 note 5.

Purpose of statutes making it misdemeanor to procure money fraudulently on contract for services is not to enforce contract to perform services but to punish fraudulent procurement of money or other thing of value under contract.—Banton v. State, supra.

Gist of offense is the fraudulent procurement of money or other thing of value, and fraudulent conduct of defendant, not merely defendant's failure to perform contract.—Broddus v. State, 14 S.E.2d 607, 65 Ga.App. 27.

in entering into the contract of employment;[5] and the statute has been held invalid as applied to a conviction based on a plea of guilty.[6] The decisions of the state courts have not been in entire harmony, some of them being in favor of the constitutionality of such statutes,[7] others holding them unconstitutional.[8]

c. Persons to Whom Statutes Apply

The labor-contract statutes ordinarily apply only to cases where the relationship involved is that of master and servant.

The so-called labor-contract statutes ordinarily are limited in their application to cases wherein the relationship involved is that of master and servant,[9] and do not apply where the relationship is that of landlord and tenant[10] or debtor and creditor.[11] Only employees who contract to do the work themselves are affected,[12] those contracting to furnish the labor of others not being included.[13] Croppers have been held to be included,[14] although the contrary has also been held.[15]

A person other than the employer may act as prosecutor where the accusation and the proof are in accord as to the fact that it was the employer who made the contract and suffered the damage.[16]

Minors. A minor who has arrived at the age of criminal responsibility may be convicted under a labor-contract law[17] although a contract of service made by him may not be civilly enforceable.[18]

d. Elements of Offense

Such elements are essential to the offense of breach of an employment contract as are prescribed by the statute defining the offense.

The essential elements of the offense of breach of an employment contract by an employee are those designated by the statute defining the offense.[19] The elements of the offense as generally defined in the labor-contract statutes, are: (1) A contract by accused for the performance of any act or service.[20] (2) An intent on the part of accused to injure or defraud his employer,[21] existing at the time of the execution of the employment contract[22] and again at the time of the employee's failure or refusal to perform.[23] (3) The obtaining by accused of money or other personal property from such employer by means of such contract.[24] (4) The refusal by accused without just cause,[25] and without refunding such money or paying for such proper-

Words "without good and sufficient cause" within statute making proof of contract to perform services, procuring thereon of money or other thing of value, and failure to perform services or return money advanced, without good and sufficient cause, presumptive evidence of intent to defraud within preceding penal provision refer to failure to perform services or return money advanced, and content which has been assigned to those words by courts is immaterial on question of validity of statute, since subsequent breach of an employment contract, however capricious or reprehensible, does not establish initial fraudulent intent.—Taylor v. State of Georgia, Ga., 62 S.Ct. 415, 315 U.S. 25, 86 L.Ed. 615.

Function of statute making failure without just cause to perform labor or service or to pay for money or other property obtained by promise to perform labor prima facie evidence of intent to defraud was to make it possible to convict where proof of guilt was lacking.—Pollock v. ty,[26] to perform such act or service.[27] (5) Loss or damage to the employer.[28]

As soon as the employee fails to perform the work called for by the employment contract, retaining the advances made on the strength of it, the offense is complete, and the right to prosecute at once arises,[29] but not until then[30] even though the circumstances strongly indicate a fraudulent intent.[31]

e. Defenses

Various matters constitute defenses to a prosecution of an employee for violation of a labor-contract statute, such as the performance of the services, or the timely repayment or offer to repay the money advanced.

In prosecutions of employees for violations of labor-contract statutes various matters have been urged in defense.[32] The performance of the services[33] or the timely repayment of the money advanced,[34] or offer to repay,[35] is a complete defense. An offer to repay all that is due the employer, without stating the exact amount, has been held sufficient.[36]

Commencement of work. Where the statute, in defining the offense, stipulates as an essential element a failure "to commence or complete" the work, the commencement of work under the contract is not in itself an absolute defense.[37]

Contract with third person. It is no defense that the employee when he obtained the advances on the employment contract was already under contract to work for another for the same period,[38] although it might be if the employer knew of the other existing contract, and the later contract was designed to work a civil injury to the employer under the first.[39]

f. Indictment, Information, or Complaint

In prosecutions of employees for violations of labor-contract statutes the general rules governing indictments, informations, and complaints in criminal prosecutions ordinarily apply.

General rules governing indictments, informations, and complaints in criminal prosecutions usually are applicable in prosecutions of employees for violations of labor-contract statutes.[40] The indictment or complaint must set forth the offense as defined in the statute.[41] It is not necessary to allege that the term of service had expired before the indictment was preferred.[42] Where the statute creates two offenses, one the fraudulent entering into a contract, in order to secure money on the faith of it, the other the fraudulent securing of money on a contract already made, the indictment must charge accused specifically with either one or both of these offenses.[43]

Contract. The indictment or complaint must set forth a contract of employment,[44] certain as to its terms and duration,[45] and of the character described in the statute.[46] It has been held not necessary to allege that the contract was in writing, even in states where the statute restricts prosecution under it to employees fraudulently securing advances on written contracts.[47]

Advances. The indictment must specify of what the advances consisted[48] and that they were obtained from the employer.[49] It may embrace in a single count various sums procured at different times,[50] provided the allegation of fraudulent intent is made to apply equally to the procurement of each sum.[51] Sums alleged to be fraudulently procured cannot be embraced in one count with other sums against which the same charge is not made.[52]

Failure to perform or repay. The indictment must set forth the employee's failure to perform the contract or to repay the advances without just cause.[53] Where the statute in terms covers advances of money or property, a failure to refund is the proper charge in an indictment where an advance of money had been made, a further averment of failure to pay for not being required.[54]

Loss or damage to employer. An allegation of loss or damage to the employer resulting from the employee's wrongful act is required.[55]

Issues, proof, and variance. When the proof does not correspond with the accusation with respect to matters legally essential to the charge, accused must be acquitted,[56] but a variance in an immaterial matter will not have that effect.[57] An accusation that the employee procured money from the employer is supported by evidence of the procurement of a draft which has been cashed.[58]

g. Evidence

(1) Presumptions and burden of proof
(2) Admissibility
(3) Weight and sufficiency

(1) Presumptions and Burden of Proof

In prosecutions for violations of labor-contract statutes the state has the burden of proving the elements of the offense.

In prosecutions of employees for violations of labor-contract statutes the burden is on the state to prove the elements of the offense,[59] as, for example, the employee's fraudulent intent[60] at the time of securing the advances,[61] the employee's failure to perform[62] or to repay the advances[63] at or before the time fixed for the performance of the services,[64] a want of good excuse for such failure to perform or repay,[65] and an actual loss or damage, capable of definite computation,[66] sustained by the employer.[67] When services have been rendered by the employee, the burden is on the state to show their value, as well as the amount of the advances.[68]

Prior to the decisions holding such a provision invalid, discussed supra subdivision b of this section, it was held that even after evidence of the facts enumerated by the statute as furnishing presumptive evidence of the employee's guilt had been introduced the burden of establishing its case was still on the state,[69] although the burden of going forward with the evidence to rebut the presumption was on the employee.[70]

Presumptions. The labor-contract statutes, after defining the offense, have usually provided that the intent to defraud shall be presumed on satisfactory proof of the contract, the procuring thereon of money or other thing of value, the failure to perform the services so contracted for, or failure to return the money so advanced, without good and sufficient cause, and loss and damage to the employer.[71] This presumption, which has been held to invalidate the statute, as considered supra subdivision b of this section, did not arise on proof of a part only of the facts enumerated,[72] but as soon as all the facts were satisfactorily proved the presumption existed,[73] even though the term of service provided for in the contract had not yet expired.[74] The presumption was not conclusive.[75]

(2) Admissibility

In prosecutions for violations of labor-contract statutes the general rules regulating the admissibility of evidence in criminal prosecutions ordinarily are applicable.

General rules governing the admissibility of evidence in criminal prosecutions usually apply in prosecutions of employees for violations of labor contract statutes.[76] The contract of employment[77] and evidence in aid of its construction[78] are admissible in evidence. The admissibility of the contract is not affected by its recital of moneys paid by the employer on the employee's account other than the advances for which the employee is being prosecuted.[79] Testimony as to who took the initiative in securing the contract is admissible as bearing on the issue of fraudulent intent.[80]

Advances. Evidence of advances made after the execution of the contract is admissible under an accusation charging that advances were made after execution and under a statute making it an offense to secure advances before or after execution with fraudulent intent;[81] but evidence that accused had on a previous occasion fraudulently obtained money on another contract is not admissible.[82]

Failure to pay. Failure of an employee to pay his debt to his employer may or may not be admissible evidence to prove an intent not to pay it at the time it was incurred, depending on its relevancy in point of time and circumstance to that issue.[83] If too remote it is not admissible,[84] notwithstanding the statutory provision that the failure to pay with other circumstances named shall raise a presumption of guilt.[85]

(3) Weight and Sufficiency

In order to warrant a conviction for a violation of a labor-contract statute the guilt of the accused must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt.

In order to convict an employee for a fraudulent breach of his contract of employment under a labor-contract law, the jury must be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt of his guilt.[86] The contract is sufficiently proved by the testimony of the parties to it, even where the statute requires a verbal employment contract to be witnessed by at least two disinterested witnesses, in order to form the basis of criminal prosecution.[87] Where the statute requires that the money procured shall be an advance of money not yet earned, the employer's characterization of the payment as an "advance" is not sufficient evidence of the fact.[88]

Intent in general. The evidence must be sufficient to prove the required fraudulent intent on the part of the employee.[89] Proof of facts indicating that the employee formed a fraudulent intent after the advances were made is not sufficient to support a conviction.[90]

The presumption of fraudulent intent raised by proof of the facts enumerated in the statute, as considered supra subdivisions b, g (1) of this section, was held not to be rebutted by the proved fact that the employee prevailed upon some third person to give security for repayment of the money advanced, unsupported by other evidence of good faith toward the surety,[91] or by the employee's agreement to repay the money advanced made after his failure to do the work,[92] or even by repayment of the money advanced unless made on or before the day fixed by the contract for the commencement of the service,[93] or by evidence that the employee was a minor and yielded to the command of a stranger to go to work for him in the absence of a satisfactory showing that he did so under fear of duress, rather than voluntarily and with the purpose of defrauding his employer in accordance with a previously formed intent.[94]

On the other hand, the presumption of bad faith was held to be successfully rebutted by evidence that the employee worked under the contract for a period of time approximating[95] or exceeding[96] in value the amount of money advanced; that he had long continued dealings with his employer of a character to negative a fraudulent intent;[97] that he mortgaged his own property to secure repayment of the money advanced;[98] that he asked another to pay his debt to his employer,[99] or refused to work for another until his debt to his employer was paid,[1] or accepted work with another on the latter's agreement to pay his debt to his former employer, and under the belief that the payment had been made.[2]

In addition, the presumption of bad faith was held to be successfully rebutted by evidence that the employee left his employment because his employer failed to perform his part of the agreement,[3] or because he had a dispute with his employer[4] or a well justified fear that he would suffer bodily harm if he continued the work;[5] that he absented himself from his work because of other demands on his time,[6] or because of the need[7] or sickness[8] of another under circumstances requiring his personal services, or because he was directed to keep away by some one having a right to control his actions;[9] or by evidence of a combination of circumstances, such as working under the contract for a period of time, failure to pay the employer what he could for fear of bodily injury if he did not pay all, and leaving his employer because of sickness.[10]

Want of good cause. An entire absence of evidence that the employee's refusal to work was without good and sufficient cause will bar a conviction under the statute,[11] even where it appears that the parties entered into an express contract and that money was fraudulently procured by the employee from the employer under it.[12] The burden resting on the state to prove the want of good cause is not sustained by the employer's opinion, unsupported by facts, that the employee had no good reason[13] or that he did not give his employee any cause[14] for leaving. Facts evidencing the employee's physical ability to work out his contract are, in the absence of other evidence, sufficient to support a finding of want of good cause.[15] The fact that the employee had good cause for his failure to perform his contract is sufficiently established by evidence that performance was impossible through no fault of his,[16] or that he could not work because of sickness[17] or physical disability.[18]

Loss or damage to employer. Loss to the employer may be shown by proving an advancement of money to the employee in excess of the value of his services at the contract rate.[19] The evidence is not sufficient to establish loss where there is no proof offered of the value of the labor done under the contract,[20] or where the value of the labor is shown to have exceeded the amount of the advances,[21] or that the employer is still in possession of the fruits of his employee's labor, and has not sold them,[22] or holds a mortgage to secure the advances and has not foreclosed it,[23] or fails to show, if he has foreclosed it, that the amount realized on the sale did not equal the amount of the advances.[24]

h. Trial

The general rules governing the trial of criminal prosecutions ordinarily are applicable in prosecutions for violations of labor-contract statutes.

General rules regulating the trial of criminal prosecutions ordinarily apply in prosecutions against employees for violations of labor-contract statutes.[25] It is for the jury to determine, on conflicting evidence, under proper instructions, whether the essentials of the crime, as defined in a labor-contract act, or the defenses thereto, have been sufficiently proved,[26] as, for example, the fraudulent intent of the employee,[27] the nature and purpose of the payment to him by his employer,[28] or the sufficiency of an offer to repay the advances.[29]

Instructions. It is the duty of the court to instruct the jury on the necessity of proving the employee's intent to defraud,[30] and its existence at the time the advances were made,[31] even in the absence of a written request to do so.[32]

B. WAGES AND OTHER REMUNERATION

1. Right to Compensation

§ 81. In General

The right of an employee to compensation rests, in general, on the performance of services under an agreement, express or implied, that compensation shall be had therefor.

The right of an employee to compensation rests, in general, on the performance of services[33] under an agreement, express or implied, that compensation shall be had therefor,[34] although there need be no definite agreement as to the amount thereof.[35] However, by express agreement of the parties, the employee may be entitled to compensation for a period of time during which no services are rendered;[36] and some contracts have been construed as entitling the employee to compensation for such period, where he was at all times ready, willing, and able to perform the services contracted for,[37] even though during such period the employee performed services for a third person.[38] It has also been held that employees whose only duty is "to stand and wait" are entitled to compensation[39] and that an employer desiring to keep a person in his employ, regardless of whether or not he is performing labor all of the time, cannot escape liability to pay wages during the time work is not being done.[40]

In the case of an express agreement as to compensation, its terms control[41] in the absence of fraud, illegality, or bad faith,[42] and provided it is supported by a sufficient consideration.[43] Thus the right of an employee to compensation may be made to depend on the fulfillment of a particular condition,[44] or may be limited to particular services,[45] or may be restricted to payment from a particular fund.[46] If the happening of the contingency on which the employee's right to wages is based is placed by his contract within the discretion or control of the employer, the contract is generally construed as requiring a fair and honest exercise of that discretion against the employee's right in order to defeat his claim.[47]

An employee's right to compensation also depends on his observance or performance of the duties of faithfulness,[48] honesty,[49] diligence,[50] loyalty,[51] and obedience;[52] but it has been held to be no defense to an action for wages that the employee's conduct was in violation of his contractual and fiduciary obligations to his employer where it is not shown that the employer was injured thereby.[53]

Use or benefit to employer. It is immaterial, as far as an employee's right to compensation is concerned, whether the employer later used or failed to use the results of his employee's labor[54] or whether the services were beneficial or profitable to him unless the payment of compensation is made contingent on the success of the employer's enterprise.[55]

Against whom right enforceable. The employer, that is, the person engaging the services of another and agreeing to pay for them, is the one liable for them,[56] notwithstanding another benefits therefrom.[57] The question as to who is the employer may be in dispute,[58] and when it involves issues of fact the liability for wages is for the jury to determine under proper instructions.[59]

Under the rule that a third person can sue on a contract made for his benefit, discussed in Contracts § 519, one who has performed labor for another may sue for his wages a third person who contracted with the hirer to pay the wages, although plaintiff was not a party to the contract.[60]

Tips or gratuities. In the absence of a prohibitory statute or order enacted pursuant to statutory authority, an employee's compensation may consist of, or include, gratuities or tips.[61]

Labor unions may be organized for the purpose of advancing[62] or maintaining[63] their wages, and may singly or in a body leave the service of their employers in order to compel an advance of wages.[64]

§ 82. Part Performance, Abandonment, or Discharge

A contract to render personal services for a specified time is ordinarily, but not always, regarded as an entire, and not as a severable, contract, on which recovery can be had only on showing full performance or a valid excuse for nonperformance.

A contract to render personal services for a specified time ordinarily is regarded as an entire contract, so that a recovery thereon can be had by the employee only on showing full performance or a valid excuse for nonperformance.[65] This is true even though the contract states the compensation to be at the rate of so much per week or month,[66] provided it does not require the actual payment of so much each month or week.[67] Likewise, performance of the entire service may be a condition precedent to a recovery of any part of the wages thereunder where the contract expressly so stipulates.[68] In other cases, however, including generally those in which the actual payment of wages within the employment term is provided for, as discussed infra § 83, the contract is construed as not contemplating its full performance as a condition precedent to recovery of a part of the compensation thereunder, and in these cases the employee may recover his wages for the time he worked.[69]

Payment periods. Where the contract of employment provides for the payment of wages at stated intervals, the payment periods are themselves regarded as entire and a recovery of wages for a particular period is dependent on services having been rendered for the full term of that period.[70]

§ 83. —— Abandonment of Service

In the absence of a provision for forfeiture, an employee who abandons his employment in violation of his contract may recover for his services rendered if the contract is severable, but not if the contract is entire.

If there is no forfeiture provision in the contract or rules governing the employment,[71] an employee who abandons his employment in violation of his contract may recover for services rendered if the contract is severable,[72] but not if the contract is entire.[73] So, if one employed for a specified time under a contract not providing for periodic payment of wages during the term quits before the expiration thereof without adequate cause or excuse, he cannot recover on the contract any unpaid wages for services rendered,[74] and this rule has been incorporated into some statutory enactments.[75] Likewise the servant may not recover money withheld out of his wages to guarantee his performance of the contract,[76] or the use of a house, rent free, to which he was entitled as long as he continued in the employment.[77]

Recovery on quantum meruit. There can be no recovery on a quantum meruit, according to the majority of decisions[78] although there is considerable authority to the contrary, especially where the employer has received a benefit from the labor in excess of any damages from the breach.[79] Where recovery on a quantum meruit is allowed, it is limited in amount to the contract price for the services minus damages for the loss sustained by the employer from the employee's abandonment, as considered infra § 113, and is conditioned on the absence from the contract of any stipulation providing for payment of the employee in kind.[80]

Periodic payments within term. In the group of cases in which a recovery is not otherwise allowable, if the contract provides, or is construed to provide, for actual payments of wages earned at intervals during the employment term, the right to wages due at the end of one of the periods vests at that time so as not to be affected by a subsequent abandonment of the contract,[81] but a recovery is not allowed where it is shown that, because of the employee's breach or other reason, there are no wages due and payable.[82] The rule is otherwise, as appears supra § 82, if the contract provides, not for the actual payment of so much each week or month, but a compensation "at the rate of" so much per week or month.

Puerto Rico.—Portela v. Porto Rican-American Tobacco Co., 4 Puerto Rico 29.

Abandonment for good cause. If the employee has good cause for quitting he may recover for the services actually performed,[83] including any part of his wages withheld to secure a faithful performance of his duties,[84] but not an additional amount in the form of salary or wages for the rest of the term.[85]

§ 84. —— Temporary Absences in General

As a general rule an employee is not entitled to recover for lost time where there is no agreement to that effect.

An employee generally is not entitled to recover for lost time where there is no agreement to that effect,[86] or where the contract of employment allows compensation only for the days the employee works.[87] Where the employee is given a vacation with pay,[88] or a leave of absence is granted,[89] or where the employee's absence is involuntary,[90] as where the employer fails to furnish work,[91] the employee is entitled to his wages for the time off. Where, however, the contract allows compensation for the employee's entire time excepting periods of nonperformance due to certain specified causes, the employee may recover for days on which he did not work on proof of his offer to do so if his nonperformance was not due to one of the specified causes.[92]

Obligation to make up lost time. When an employee leaves his employer's service after he has worked for the full term agreed on, he cannot be said to have abandoned the service and forfeited the wages due him simply because he had refused to work after the term had expired in order to make up for lost time[93] unless the original contract provides that time lost shall be made up;[94] even then, if the employer is responsible for the loss of time, the employee may refuse to make it up without subjecting himself to the charge of abandonment.[95]

§ 85. —— Sickness, Death, or Other Disability

The death, sickness, or other disability of the employer or employee prevents recovery for services for the entire contract period; but recovery ordinarily may be had for services performed up to the time of an employee's death or of his absence because of sickness.

In the absence of a stipulation to the contrary, the death of either party, or sickness or other disability, preventing its performance, terminates the employment contract, as discussed supra §§ 37, 38, and recovery cannot be had for services for the entire contract period.[96] Subject to rules promulgated by the employer and binding on the employee,[97] a recovery may be had for services actually performed by an employee up to the time of his death,[98] or to the time of his absence because of

The fact that railroad continued employee on its seniority rolls during period of his disability, in order to preserve his rights if he should ever become able to return to work, and granted him privileges to which only an employee was entitled, did not authorize recovery by employee on quantum meruit for time during which he performed no services, and merely visited employers' officials in his own behalf.—Sickelco v. sickness,[99] even though after absence from illness the employee does not return and offer to complete the period of service.[1] The rule does not apply where the sickness ought to have been anticipated at the time the contract was made,[2] as in the case of confinement in childbirth,[3] or where the contract is entire and the abandonment is for some other and unjustifiable reason, the sickness being made the pretext for the recovery of wages to which otherwise the employee would not be entitled under the law.[4]

§ 86. —— Destruction of Place of Work

One employed to work in a particular building which is accidentally destroyed is entitled to wages for services already rendered, but not for the remainder of the term; but where the employment has no reference to the continued existence of any particular place of work, an employee may recover for the full term despite such destruction.

One employed to work in a particular building which is destroyed by inevitable accident after part performance is entitled to his wages for the services rendered,[5] but not for the remaining part of the contract term.[6] Where, however, the employment has no reference to the continued existence of any particular place of work, the destruction of the place of work does not affect the employee's right to his compensation for the full contract term.[7]

§ 87. —— Discharge

An employee discharged for cause cannot recover future wages under the contract, but under most authorities he can recover for services actually rendered except that, where periodic payments are provided for, he cannot recover for services rendered during the fractional part of the employment period in which he was discharged.

An employee who has been discharged for cause is not entitled to recover future wages or other future compensation under the contract;[8] nor can he recover under the contract for services for an entire employment period where he was discharged after having performed them only in part,[9] or for a time equivalent to the notice period, where the employer is required by the contract to give notice of its termination.[10] It is only where an employee, hired for a term, is dismissed without just cause before the expiration of the term that he is entitled to receive the whole of his wages for the entire term.[11]

In the absence of a contract stipulation to the contrary, it has generally been held that an employee discharged for cause may recover for services actually rendered[12] although under some au-

Awaiting passage home

Under the terms of a particular contract, an employee working abroad and discharged without ground has been held entitled to salary for the time he had to wait after discharge for passage home, where the delay was not due to his fault, although he was chargeable with the reasonable value of his subsistence while awaiting passage; but an employee discharged by the supervising officer, acting in good faith, on the ground that his services were unsatisfactory, has been held not entitled to salary for the period of transportation home, and an employee properly discharged for refusing to work was held chargeable with the cost of transportation home and with the cost of subsistence while awaiting transportation.—Bradley v. McWilliams Dredging Co., 67 N.Y.S.2d 145.

Failure to protest wrongful discharge

Where evidence demanded finding that employee failed to file grievance or protest concerning his discharge for violation of rule relating to intoxication, within sixty days after discharge, as required by agreement between employer and certain of its employees, employee could not recover wages he would have earned had he not been discharged, on theory that discharge was wrongful.—Crow v. Southern Ry. Co., 18 S.E.2d 690, 66 Ga.App. 608.

thorities no recovery is allowed[13] except where the contract provides for periodic payments through the employment term, in which case the employee is entitled to such wages as have already become due at the expiration of one or more of such periods.[14] Where the latter rule is followed, any cause sufficient to justify a discharge of the employee will bar a recovery of wages regardless of whether such cause was given as the reason at the time of the discharge.[15]

Where periodic payments are provided for in the contract, it has been held that the employee cannot recover for services rendered during the fractional part of the employment period in which he was discharged[16] unless the contract expressly so provides.[17]

Vacation with pay. Since, as discussed infra § 96, a vacation with pay is in effect additional wages, an employee who has done the work necessary to earn such vacation cannot be deprived thereof by wrongful discharge;[18] but where the discharge is for just cause the employee is not entitled to vacation pay.[19]

Severance or dismissal pay. Where the contract of employment so provides, the employee may be entitled to severance or dismissal pay on termination of his employment by the employer.[20] A contract providing for severance pay on dismissal except for certain causes has been held clear and unambiguous and not susceptible of a construction modifying its terms.[21]

Deferred salary payments. A contract providing for the making of deferred salary payments cannot be avoided by the discharge of the employee.[22]

§ 88. —— Consent or Option to Terminate

Where an employment contract is terminated in accordance with its provisions, the employee may recover compensation for services rendered up to the time of termination.

Where the contract of employment is terminable at the option of either party, the employee may quit at any time and recover for the services actually performed.[23] Accordingly, on discharge by the employer under such a contract,[24] or under a statute allowing the employer to terminate the contract at will,[25] the employee may recover pro rata, recovery being allowed for a fractional part of an employment or payment period during which services are rendered.[26]

Termination after notice. Where the contract is terminable by one party on giving notice to the other a certain fixed time before the cancellation, the employee may recover wages or other compensation up to the time the cancellation takes effect.[27]

Termination by consent. Likewise, when the parties terminate the employment by mutual consent before the expiration of the term, the contract becomes fully executed,[28] and the employee may recover for the services actually performed[29] unless the parties agree otherwise.[30] A recovery is also allowed where the employee leaves his employment voluntarily with the acquiescence of his employer even though the contract calls for service for a fixed period and payment for the entire service at the end of the period.[31]

Special agreements. An agreement of the employer, made at the time of entering the employment, relative to the settlement of the employee's claims on termination of the contract, will be enforced.[32]

§ 89. —— Indefinite Term

An employee whose term of service is not fixed may, on quitting or being discharged, recover at the stipulated rate for the time worked.

Where no term of service is fixed by the contract of employment, and the employee quits[33] or is discharged,[34] he may recover at the stipulated rate for the time he has worked. Before the liability to pay ceases, there must be a termination of the contract.[35]

§ 90. Commissions

a. In general
b. Construction of provisions
c. Conditions precedent

a. In General

An employee's right to commissions as compensation for services depends on the language of the employment contract. Unless the contract provides otherwise, an employee is not entitled to commissions on orders which he himself has not secured.

Where commissions by way of compensation for services are provided for by the contract of employment, or by a separate contract supplemental thereto, the employee, on the performance of his contract obligations, is entitled to recover the amount due him on that account.[36] In the absence of a provision allowing commissions, an employee entitled to a reasonable compensation for his services cannot claim commissions in lieu thereof;[37] nor is he entitled to commissions on transactions not connected in any way with his employer's business,[38] or on orders other than those which he has

Illness; payment of salary during illness

(1) The payment of deceased employee's regular salary for two weeks while employee was ill did not effect a discharge of employer's separate obligation, under contract of employment, to pay commissions which employee had earned, so as to bar recovery of such commissions by employee's administratrix.—Maloney v. B. J. Goldenberg, Inc., 54 N.Y.S. 2d 65.

(2) Where contract provided that plaintiff was to act as sales manager "during his pleasure," and that if he discontinued selling he was to waive commissions and be entitled only to royalties, plaintiff's abandonment of business because of illness through uncontrollable use of intoxicants did not excuse default, but was a discontinuance under the contract depriving him of right to commissions.—Cammack v. himself secured,[39] unless the contract is construed to extend his right.[40]

Certainty. A provision for commissions must be clear and definite,[41] but errors of expression not obscuring the intention of the parties will not defeat the employee's right.[42] A provision for commissions is not void for uncertainty as not disclosing the basis for computation where it is clearly disclosed by evidence of the circumstances under which the contract was made.[43]

Separate contract. Where a contract for commissions follows and is distinct from the employment contract, it must itself be based on a separate and valid consideration.[44] The performance of other duties connected with his work, but outside the scope of the original contract, is a sufficient consideration for the later agreement.[45]

Time of shipment or billing. In the absence of a clear agreement to the contrary,[46] an employee selling on a commission basis is entitled to commission on a sale when the sale is made, irrespective of when shipment[47] or billing[48] takes place.

Deductions. An employee's commissions are properly reduced by the amount which the employer has paid to a third person with the employee's consent.[49]

Cancellation of order. A salesman negotiating a contract giving the buyer the right to cancel the order, or part of it, cannot recover commissions on the unfilled portion of the order;[50] but an employer agreeing to pay a commission on accepted orders has been required to pay commission on such orders even though they are subsequently canceled by him or the purchaser, or even though the purchaser returns the goods.[51]

b. Construction of Provisions

General rules governing the construction of contracts have been applied in construing provisions for commissions in contracts of employment.

A contract containing provisions governing an employee's right to commissions must be construed as a whole.[52] Unambiguous contractual provisions of this nature, entered into by the parties without fraud or misrepresentation, will be enforced even

Assistance in making sale
Salesman not securing purchaser, but only assisting employer in making sale, was not entitled to commission.—Spindle v. Michigan Inv. Co., 240 N.W. 79, 257 Mich. 40.

Facts that salesman negotiated with buyers, procured their good will, and brought them to his employer does not in itself entitle him to commissions.—Binner v. George Ethridge Co., 150 N.E. 570, 241 N.Y. 598.

Single salesman in territory
The fact that a manufacturing corporation sends but one salesman into a certain district does not make his appointment exclusive, or, in the absence of express agreement to that effect, entitle him to a commission on all sales within that territory, whether or not made by him.—Hellam Furniture Co. v. though harsh.[53] The construction placed by the parties to the contract on such provisions has been declared the soundest guide to their meaning,[54] and will be followed unless there is some rule of law forbidding it or precluding its adoption.[55]

Particular provisions. Particular contracts have been held to limit the commissions to sales made personally by the employee,[56] or during the term of his employment,[57] or in a particular territory,[58] or to the employer's customers,[59] or to all sales in a particular store, as distinguished from the sales in the employer's entire business;[60] and sales effected through the efforts of a "special dealer" have been held excluded from an agreement for commission,[61] as has a bad account which was rejected by the employer and became the personal obligation of the employee.[62]

The courts have construed contracts allowing commissions "on orders,"[63] "on accepted orders,"[64] "on net sales,"[65] "on all sales,"[66] on sales "fully consummated" and paid for,[67] "on all goods shipped, retained and paid for,"[68] on goods delivered,[69] "on cash receipts, less all expenses,"[70] "on money expended,"[71] on the amount "realized" on sales,[72] on "all business developed" and "all wholesale business obtained,"[73] "on all the business" of the employer of a particular kind,[74] on orders for goods "to be used" in certain territory,[75] and "on every bushel of seed sold by us."[76]

The term "sales," as used in this connection, has been held to mean accepted orders,[77] although in particular circumstances commissions have been held not due on unfilled orders;[78] and a barter has been held a sale within a contract for commission on sales.[79] Completion of the transaction by the employee himself has been held not essential to the right to commission where the elements of a sale by him are present.[80]

The terms "net profit"[81] and "present dealers"[82] have also been construed.

c. Conditions Precedent

Where an employee's right to commissions is made conditional, he cannot recover commissions unless the condition is performed or fulfilled.

An employee's right to commissions may be conditioned on the performance by him or by his employer of some specific act prescribed in the contract, or on the existence of a particular situation, in which case there can be no recovery of the commissions except on performance or fulfillment of the condition;[83] the restriction, however, does not extend to other commissions in the same contract not subject to the same condition.[84] Where the employee's right to recover is conditioned on an act which the employer is obligated by the contract to perform, the employee's rights will not be defeated by the employer's default;[85] and, where the act, is one in the performance of which the contract gives the employer discretionary powers, he is required to exercise his powers fairly and honestly.[86]

Where the parties agree that commissions are to be deemed earned only if and when the orders obtained are filled and fully paid for, and the buyer does not accept or pay for goods ordered, the fact that the employer realizes, from other sources, almost as much as the buyer should have paid does not entitle the salesman to commissions.[87]

§ 91. —— Advances

Under a contractual provision for periodic advances to an employee on his commission account, he is entitled to the advance at the end of each period, irrespective of the amount of commissions earned.

Under a contract providing for periodic advances to an employee on his commission account, the employee is entitled to the advance agreed on at the end of each period, irrespective of the amount of the commissions earned,[88] in the absence of a special agreement to the contrary,[89] notwithstanding the employee has already received notice of his discharge to take effect at the end of the current period,[90] and especially where the contract refers to the advance by the employer as a "privilege" commissions on all accepted orders, whether received by company from customers by direct address to home office, or through the salesman, but the contract excepted business received from the company's "present dealers" from the business on which commissions were to be paid, all business from trade that had been established by company prior to date of the contract was excluded, and not only business from "dealers" in the sense of persons who bought from company for purpose of resale.—Helfer v. Drawing account

(1) A drawing account is a well-recognized modern business method of furnishing the employee with means of maintenance while engaged in the service from which wages or commissions are to accrue.—Packard Motors Co. of Alabama v. Tally, 103 So. 455, 457, 212 Ala. 487.

(2) A drawing account is not salary.—Hoeland v. Lange, 184 N.Y.S. 885, 113 Misc. 469.

(3) Term "drawing account" has been held without ambiguity to mean that, whatever the amount drawn by employee under contract, such amount was in form of salary for services and not an advance against commissions to be earned.—Bankers Union Life Ins. Co. v. Atschel, 49 P. 2d 385, 97 Colo. 377.

(4) Provision of contract that credit department should pass on orders and commission would be lost on customer's failure to pay was consistent with construction that employee was entitled to drawing account regardless of commissions.—Eagle v. Hoffman, 258 Ill.App. 234.

granted to the employee[91] or as salary.[92] A contract providing as to advances must be read in its entirety[93] and be so construed as to effectuate the intentions of the parties.[94] A provision in a contract, guaranteeing a yearly income from commissions, to the effect that any deficiency of commissions earned in one year shall not be carried forward to a succeeding year, will not apply to commissions on goods sold during the last year of the employment term but not paid for until the following year, the contract providing that commissions shall not be regarded as earned until payment is made.[95]

Salary and commissions. A provision in the employment contract for a salary and commissions, the salary to be deducted from any commission that might be due, has been construed to give the employee a guaranteed minimum compensation[96] and to render the commission provisions inoperative as long as the commissions do not exceed the agreed salary.[97]

Loan repaid out of commissions. The employee is equally entitled to payment where the employer agrees to lend the employee a stated amount at fixed intervals, provided the employer has bound himself to look only to the earned commissions for the repayment of the loans.[98]

Advance as constituting guaranty. A provision in an employment contract allowing the employee advances or a drawing account, the amount of the regular payments being fixed, has been variously interpreted by the courts, the provision in some instances being held to constitute a guaranty,[99] limited to a stated period if the contract so limits it;[1] in others it has been held not to constitute a guaranty.[2]

Ordinarily an employee does not forfeit his right to commissions, already earned, by the termination of his employment.

Ordinarily an employee does not forfeit his right to commissions, already earned under his contract, by the termination of his employment,[3] as by his discharge,[4] unless the contract of employment provides otherwise[5] or provides for the performance of services as an entirety,[6] or unless there is a recognized custom in the business that such right will terminate with the employment.[7] So an employee loses his potential right to commissions on sales begun, or orders taken, by him during his term of service but not completed until after its termination, where, by the contract, the commission is not to be considered as earned until the sale has been completed by the delivery and acceptance of the goods,[8] or by delivery and full payment,[9] or by other settlement;[10] and a commission has been denied on renewal contracts or renewal business secured after the employee's discharge.[11]

Circumstances not amounting to forfeiture. An employee does not lose his right to commissions already earned by accepting an increase in his compensation in some other form,[12] or by consenting to the employment of others engaged in the same work,[13] or by changes in the bookkeeping methods of his employer,[14] or by subsequent negotiations between the employer and the customer after he has earned his commissions,[15] or by mistakes in his estimates as to the cost of work forming the basis of his commissions, where they are not due to his negligence and do not result in injury to his employer,[16] or by organizing a new competing company while employed under a contract allowing the employee to terminate the contract on giving notice, where he gave such notice before actually beginning to work for the new company;[17] and an employee does not forfeit his right to commissions on sales by his failure to keep a true account of sales made and of merchandise on hand, where the employer was fully credited with the amounts found due by his auditor and there was no negligence on the employee's part in handling the accounts.[18]

§ 93. Profits or Products of Business

a. In general

b. Nature and extent of right

a. In General

An employee's right to a share of the profits must be founded on a valid and clear contract obligation of the employer, and is conditioned on the existence of profits and the performance by the employee of his contractual obligations.

An employee's right to a share in the profits, to be enforceable, must be founded on a contract obligation of his employer,[19] based on a legal consideration,[20] and defined in clear and explicit terms.[21] Such agreements, it has been held, should be sustained by the courts whenever possible.[22]

22. Md.—Vincent v. Palmer, 19 A.2d 183, 179 Md. 365.

Reason for rule
Such agreements tend to create a better understanding between employers and employees.—Vincent v. Palmer, supra.

The employee's right is conditioned on the existence of profits[23] applicable, under the terms of the contract, to payment of the employee's claim.[24] An employee claiming a share of profits under a profit-sharing plan must show conformity to its provisions,[25] but substantial performance on the employee's part has been held sufficient to entitle him to his share of profits.[26]

Good faith and fair dealing require that neither party be permitted to take an unfair advantage or enjoy greater rights than called for by the terms of the agreement;[27] one may not obtain a secret profit or undue benefit.[28]

Relationship of parties. An employee, under a contract giving him a share in the profits of his employer's business as compensation for his services, is not a partner of his employer, as discussed in the C.J.S. title Partnership § 20, also 47 C.J. p 682 note 97–p 685 note 18, or a joint adventurer, as considered in Joint Adventures § 2 a. Firm money belongs solely to the employer as the owner of the business until transferred or set apart for the employee's benefit;[29] the employee cannot hold the employer liable as trustee[30] until, by the operation of the contract or otherwise, he secures legal title to specific property in the possession of his employer.[31]

b. Nature and Extent of Right

An employee entitled to a share of the profits has merely a right to his compensation; he is restricted to the profits of the business with reference to which he is employed, and cannot share in the profits of other ventures of his employee or, unless the contract provides otherwise, in the profit from a sale of the business. He must share the losses if the contract so provides, but not otherwise.

An employee who is allowed a share of the net profits of his employer's business has merely a right to his compensation;[32] he has no right to demand that his employer shall exercise reasonable skill and diligence in the conduct of his business,[33] although through his own negligence he may lose a share of the profits to which he would otherwise have been entitled.[34] He does, however, have a right to demand that his employer shall act toward him in good faith,[35] and, where he has a share in the net profits from sales, that the employer shall conduct the sales in the usual way.[36] An employee entitled to a share in the "earned profits" is entitled to a share of the book profits when earned, even though they are not later collected through no fault of his own.[37]

Extent of right. The employee is restricted to the profits of the business as constituted when he enters the employment and with reference to which he is employed,[38] and is not entitled to share in profits from other business ventures of his employer in which he is not concerned,[39] or in money received by the employer for the business but not shown to constitute profits.[40] On the other hand, if a contract gives to an employee a per cent of the profits of a department of the employer's business, his contract rights will not be affected by any act of the employer impairing the earning capacity of the department as then constituted.[41] An employee under a contract for a per cent of the net profits is entitled to a per cent of the profits derived from the business as a whole, and not of the profits of any specific piece of business;[42] thus he is not entitled to an interest in the profits from the profitable pieces of business without reference to losses sustained on other pieces of business.[43] The employee must also share the losses of the business where the contract so provides,[44] but not otherwise.[45]

An employee has no interest in profits gained by the employer after the termination of their contract and without the rendition of any service by the employee;[46] nor is he entitled, on the ground of his right to profits, to a share of a reserve fund withdrawn from profits, with his consent, to protect the employer from losses.[47]

Profits from sale of business. The employee is not entitled to share in the profit made by the employer from a sale of his entire business[48] unless the contract of employment stipulates that he shall be so entitled.[49]

§ 94. —— Dividends

In accordance with the contractual language, an employee may be restricted to a share of dividends actually declared, or may have the right to a per cent of profits available for dividends regardless of whether a dividend is actually declared.

A contract making dividends declared on corporate stock the basis of computation of profits may give the employee the right to have his per cent computed on net profits available for dividends regardless of whether or not a dividend is actually declared,[50] such a construction being supported by other terms in the contract stipulating that certain items of expense shall be deducted from the gross receipts in computing the amount due the employee.[51] On the other hand, a contract may restrict the employee's right to a share in dividends actually declared.[52] The contract determines the right of the employee to an apportionment of dividends declared after the termination of his employment,[53] or to have the computation of the dividend rate based on the amount of capital stock existing at the time he entered the employment, unaffected by any later increases, where his share is determined, not by the amount of the fund distributed as dividends, but by the dividend rate.[54]

Stock dividend. A promise to pay an employee the equivalent of the regular dividend on a stated amount of stock has been held not to entitle him to a share of a stock dividend.[55]

§ 95. —— Drawing Account and Advances

Under a contract providing for an employee's share of the net profits and a drawing account of a fixed sum payable periodically, the drawing account is payable absolutely.

§ 96. Additional Compensation and Charges

An employee may not demand more than the contractual wage unless he can establish a supervening contract. Ordinarily he cannot recover compensation for the time spent in going to, and returning from, work.

Where a contract of employment specifies a wage rate, the employee may not demand more unless he can establish a supervening contract.[57] An agreement for extra compensation which is not ambiguous or subject to different interpretations cannot be varied or overthrown by any practical construction which the parties may have placed on it.[58]

Statutory regulations affecting the right to additional compensation are considered infra §§ 151 (1)–160 (13).

A vacation with pay is, in effect, additional wages.[59]

Traveling to and from work. Ordinarily an employee cannot recover compensation for the time spent in going to, and returning from, his work under normal circumstances,[60] although where there are special circumstances creating a situation beyond his control and for the convenience or interest of the employer the employee may be entitled to compensation for such time.[61]

§ 97. —— Extra Work

a. In general

b. Extra work within scope of employment

c. Extra work outside scope of employment

a. In General

gal consideration,[64] and a mere promise of the employer to pay extra wages for any work which it is already the duty of the employee to perform cannot be enforced.[65]

Custom. A uniform and notorious custom that extra work shall be paid for, sufficient to warrant the presumption that a contract was made with reference thereto, will justify a recovery for extra work by the employee.[66]

Overtime. Where the agreement so provides, an employee may recover for overtime work[67] notwithstanding he has given to his employer receipts for his salary.[68] Where the agreement in terms disallows extra compensation for overtime, no recovery can be had on that account,[69] even though the employee is a member of a union and the employer's agreement with the union provides for overtime payment.[70]

b. Extra Work within Scope of Employment

In the absence of special agreement or custom, an employee generally cannot recover extra compensation for extra work performed within the scope of his employment.

Generally,[71] and in the absence of a special agreement as to additional compensation,[72] or of evidence showing an intent to pay it,[73] or of a uniform and notorious custom sufficient to warrant the presumption that the contract was made with reference thereto,[74] an employee cannot recover extra compensation for extra work performed within the scope of his employment even if the extra work is done at the request of the employer.[75] The rule applies to overtime,[76] work on Sundays[77] or holidays,[78] and to work during the vacation period.[79]

The presumption is either that the employee volunteers such services[80] or that the salary or other compensation provided for in the contract is intended by the parties to compensate him also for the extra work.[81]

Incidental work. Where the work, while not strictly within the scope of the employment, may still be considered as reasonably incidental to it, an intention on the part of the employer to pay extra compensation for it is not generally to be inferred from his knowledge that the employee was doing the work,[82] or even from the fact that he had requested its performance.[83]

c. Extra Work outside Scope of Employment

An employee rendering extra services so far outside the scope of his employment that an intention to pay for them may be inferred may generally recover therefor even in the absence of an express agreement.

Where the extra services rendered are so far outside the scope of the employment that an intention to pay for them may be inferred, the general rule is that the employee may recover therefor even in the absence of an express agreement.[84] This rule must be cautiously applied, however, and the services must be so far outside the sphere of the employment as to indicate a probable intention on the part of the employer to allow extra compensation therefor.[85] There can be no recovery for extra work where the implied agreement to pay is negatived by the evidence[86] or where there is a failure to prove the performance of the extra work.[87]

§ 98. —— Bonus

a. In general
b. Conditions

a. In General

In order to be enforceable, a promise of a bonus must be clear and explicit and based on a consideration. Such a promise cannot be arbitrarily withdrawn in fraud of persons relying thereon, and the right to a bonus cannot be defeated by arbitrary discharge of the employee unless the contract provides otherwise.

A promise of additional compensation to an employee in the form of a bonus, in order to be enforceable, must be clear and explicit[88] and based on a sufficient consideration.[89] It has been held not

Indefiniteness as to amount
(1) Promise to employee that fifty per cent balance of bonus would be paid on completion of vessels then under construction was not indefinite as to amount, although promise to increase bonus if profits were greater was too vague to base recovery thereon.—George A. (2) Salesman suing for bonus, on basis of employer's agreement, which did not fix any proportion between profit which employer was to make and bonus to be paid by reason thereof, so that promise to pay bonus was so indefinite as to be unenforceable, could not recover, since agreement provided no basis on which court could arrive at measure of recovery.—Crowell v. necessary that the employee give notice to the employer that he accepts his offer of a bonus; the doing of the act on which the payment of the bonus is conditioned completes the contract.[90]

An instrument embodying the offer or promise of a bonus must be construed as a whole[91] and in the light of the surrounding circumstances;[92] it must be interpreted as the parties have made it, even though its forfeiture provisions seem harsh.[93] A payment may be in effect a bonus although designated as salary.[94]

The offer of a bonus may not be arbitrarily withdrawn when to do so would perpetrate a fraud on those who, in good faith, attempted to perform the service;[95] nor does a condition that the officers of the employing company shall be the sole judges as to what bonus, if any, shall be paid authorize the arbitrary withholding of a bonus payment;[96] nor can an employee's right to a bonus be defeated by the mere inaction of his employer or of the latter's officers.[97] An employee's right to a promised bonus cannot be defeated by an arbitrary discharge[98] unless the contract provides that the employer may discharge the employee at any time and that no bonus shall be payable in the event of discharge,[99] or that the employment may be terminated at any time and that payment of a bonus, on such termination, shall be entirely at the discretion of the employer;[1] and an employee's forfeiture of an earned bonus by voluntarily leaving his position will not be enforced where the employer's right to enforce forfeiture is not clear and unequivocal.[2]

Bonus at end of year. A promise to pay an employee a bonus at the end of the year is a mere gratuity and not enforceable where the employee is not shown to have done or foregone something which otherwise he was not obliged to do or forego;[3] but if the employee is induced thereby to do something which he is not under legal obligation

Gratuity

(1) A bonus paid to employees who turned out more work than stated minimum, the size of the bonus depending on the amount of excess production, was not a gratuity or a gift.—Walling v. Stone, C.C.A.Ill., 131 F.2d 461.

(2) Employment at fixed salary for each stated period, and, in addition, bonus in case of service for specified time, is valid, bonus not being promise of mere gratuity.—Warren v. Mosher, 250 P. 354, 31 Ariz. 33, 49 A.L.R. 1311.

(3) Statement to employee, at time of paying bonus, that employer, at completion of ships then under construction, would pay additional bonus, was held to be definite promise and not mere expression of intention to give gratuity.—George A. Fuller Co. v. Brown, C.C.A.N.C., 15 F.2d 672.

(4) An employer's promise to an employee to give a bonus or other benefit, conditioned on the doing of an act which the employee does, creates an enforceable contract; but the present and unconditional bestowing of a benefit, without costs to the employee, is a mere gratuity not constituting a contract.—Meyerson v. Employee's failure to bind himself

Where an offer was made to pay a bonus if the employee should, through additional efforts, produce the result contemplated in the bonus offer, the fact that the employee did not bind himself to produce such result is immaterial; if the offer was acted on by him while still in effect, and the result was obtained, the contractual obligation to pay the bonus follows.—Sieck v. Hall, 34 P. 2d 844, 139 Cal.App. 279.

to do, or to forego something which he does not have to forego, the promise is enforceable.[4] An employee who is discharged for justifiable cause,[5] or who voluntarily quits before the end of the year,[6] or whose employment rightfully terminates before that time[7] is not entitled to a bonus payable at the end of the year. Particular language expressing the employer's dissatisfaction with the employee's services has been held not to constitute a cancellation of such a bonus provision.[8]

Proportionate part for partial performance. Where the discharge of an employee is justifiable or for cause, he is not entitled to a portion of the bonus proportionate to the part of the term served;[9] recovery of a proportionate part of the bonus promised is generally permitted in cases growing out of the wrongful discharge of the employee during the specified term[10] or in cases where the bonus is offered by the employer, and accepted by the employee, as an added inducement for continuous service.[11]

b. Conditions

An employee is not entitled to a bonus until the conditions designated in the contract for its payment have been fulfilled unless he shows a modification or waiver of the conditions or unless the nonfulfillment is due to the fault of the employer.

An employee is not entitle to a bonus until after the time stipulated in the contract for its payment,[12] or until other conditions designated in the contract for its payment have been fulfilled,[13] in the absence of evidence establishing a modification or waiver of the conditions,[14] and unless the nonfulfillment is due to the employer's act or omission.[15] Where the obligation for the fulfillment of the conditions does not rest on the employer,[16] or where the nonfulfillment has resulted in spite of his honest effort to prevent it[17] the employee cannot recover. A substantial performance of the conditions may be regarded as sufficient.[18]

Bonus for satisfactory services. Where a bonus is given for satisfactory services, it is within the discretion of the employer to determine whether the employee's service has been satisfactory,[19] but the discretion must be fairly and reasonably exercised.[20] If the employee is discharged for cause, it has been held that he is not entitled to the bonus.[21] It has been held that if he continues to the end of his term he can recover in the absence of evidence of the employer's dissatisfaction,[22] although under other authority he cannot recover unless he introduces affirmative and legally sufficient evidence of the employer's satisfaction.[23]

Bonus for continuous service. A bonus granted for continuous service is payable generally on the performance of the conditions imposed by the contract.[24] Where an employee serves only a part of the term for which he is employed, he may still recover an amount of bonus money proportionate to the term of his actual service where the employer has offered a bonus for continuous service over a longer term than the payment period of a week or month, and has discharged the employee without cause within the bonus term, but at the end of one of the payment periods,[25] or where the employer has offered to make a proportionate payment on certain contingencies, one of which has happened,[26] or where, in the case of an employment terminable at the will of either party, the employer has discharged the employee without cause,[27] the result being different if the employee voluntarily abandons the service or is discharged for cause.[28]

§ 99. Food, Clothing, Lodging, and Education

Ordinarily there is no implied contract to furnish food, clothing, or lodging as part of an employee's compensation; but, apart from express contracts of this nature, such an agreement may be implied from the conduct of the parties or where necessary for the rendering of the services.

Ordinarily there is no implied contract on the part of an employer to furnish food, clothing, or lodging in addition to wages or salary as a part of the employee's compensation,[29] even where the employee is injured in the performance of his duties.[30] A contract to furnish food, clothing, or lodging may be implied from the conduct of the parties[31] or where necessary for the rendering of the services.[32] There can be no such implication on the ground of necessity with reference to the furnishing of the employee with an education,[33] especially where the employee is under no restraint and can leave the service at any time.[34]

Express provisions. The employer's obligation to furnish food, clothing, or lodging exists where the contract provides for it in express terms,[35] subject to such restrictions as may be contained therein[36] or as may be imposed under statute.[37] In such case the obligation has been held to continue through a period of sickness during which the employee is not able to work.[38] The termination of the employment usually ends the right under the employment contract to food, clothing, lodging, or occupancy of premises.[39]

If the employee repudiates an agreement under which he is to receive a fixed sum and board and recovers, on the employer's default, the full value of his services, the employer may sue to recover back the value of board furnished to the employee under the agreement.[40] On the other hand, if the employer repudiates his agreement to furnish board and clothes, the employee may recover the reasonable value of his services.[41]

§ 100. Reimbursement of Expenditures

Expenditures made by an employee in connection with his work are to be paid for by the employer or by the employee as the contract between them provides.

Expenditures made by an employee in connection with his work are to be paid for by the employer or by the employee as the contract between them provides.[42] Where the contract makes no provision, if it appears that the parties intended that he should be reimbursed therefor, the employee may claim reimbursement for any expenditures incurred by him,[43] reasonable in amount and reasonably incidental to his work,[44] and subject only to such restrictions as the employer may place on him[45] or as may be implied from their conduct or practice.[46] Where, however, it does not appear to have been the intention of the parties that the employee should be reimbursed for expenses incurred by him, no promise will be implied to pay him therefor.[47]

In the absence of an agreement to the contrary, an employer has the right to discriminate among his employees in the matter of allowing expense accounts.[48]

Living expenses. An employee's living expenses are not generally regarded as expenses incidental to his work for which his employer is liable,[49] even where the employment contract allows the employee a stated amount "for his expenses;"[50] but the employment contract may make the employer liable for living expenses in particular circumstances.[51]

Expenses incidental to negotiations for contract. Whether expenses incidental to the negotiations for employment are to be paid for by the employer depends entirely on how far the employer obligates himself by contract to do so;[52] they cannot be recovered on failure of the negotiations if their payment is conditioned on employment[53] or if the failure is due to the refusal of the employee to perform the contract after it is made.[54]

Passage money. In the absence of a binding contract, an employee may not claim to be reimbursed for his expenses for transportation to or from the

Compensation limited to commissions

Under contract limiting salesman's compensation to commissions on "all orders he may obtain," salesman could not recover expenses incurred for travel or otherwise.—Deitchman v. Korach, 71 N.E.2d 367, 330 Ill.App. 365.

place of work;[55] but such an obligation on the part of the employer may be implied.[56] An employee not abiding by the terms of the employment contract with respect to the payment of transportation expenses cannot recover such expenses under the contract.[57]

Advances made to an employer by an employee, on the understanding that the latter was to be reimbursed, may be recovered by him.[58]

§ 101. Interest

If wages are not payable on a certain date, or if the amount is unliquidated, interest does not begin to run thereon until after a demand; if wages are payable at a specified time interest generally runs from that date.

If wages are not payable on a certain date,[59] or if the amount due as wages is unliquidated,[60] interest does not begin to run thereon until after a demand for payment. On the other hand, if wages are payable at a specified time, the general rule is that interest runs from that date;[61] and interest on unpaid wages has also been allowed from the date of termination of the employment.[62] It has been held, under a statute regulating hours of labor and wages of laborers employed by the state, that such an employee is entitled to interest on a valid claim for overtime wages from the date of the filing of the claim.[63]

Where, by the terms of the employment contract, an employee's share of the profits is to remain in the business until termination of the contract, the employee has been held entitled to interest on such share only from the date of such termination;[64] and, where the contract is to pay an employee a fraction of the profits after a deduction for invested capital, the employee has been held entitled to interest on the portion of the invested capital wrongfully withheld from him in the annual statements.[65] An employer terminating a profit-sharing contract and selling the goods on hand within a reasonable time thereafter has been held not chargeable with interest during such period, but only for the period following the sale during which he fails and refuses to account.[66]

§ 102. Deductions, Forfeitures, and Fines

Except where authorized by the contract or justified by the employee's misconduct or failure fully to perform, an employer may not claim any deduction from, or forfeiture of, his employee's wages.

Forfeiture of, or deductions from, the wages agreed to be paid an employee may result from an express provision therefor in a contract of hire, as discussed infra § 103, or may follow, independently thereof, from a failure fully to perform the services to the end of the term agreed on, infra § 104, or from the negligence or misconduct of the employee in the course of his employment, infra § 105. Except where authorized or justified in one of these ways, an employer may not claim any deduction from, or forfeiture of, his employee's wages,[67] a contract obligation without the forfeiture clause does not have that effect.[68]

§ 103. —— Contractual Provisions for Deductions or Forfeitures

a. In general
b. Validity, construction, and operation

a. In General

A provision for forfeiture of wages may bind an employee even though in a writing other than the hiring contract and even though not coming into existence until after he enters the employment. Rules or regulations providing for forfeiture under stated circumstances bind the employee if he has knowledge or notice thereof and can be taken to have assented thereto.

68. Mass.—Hunt v. Otis Co., 4 Metc. 464.

A provision for forfeiture of wages may be binding on the employee even though contained in some writing other than the contract of hiring,[69] and even though it does not come into existence until after the employee enters the employment.[70]

An employer's agreement to return deductions made, on a certain condition, is enforceable only on fulfillment of such condition.[71]

Regulations and assent thereto. An employee cannot be penalized for the violation of a rule providing for forfeiture of wages under stated circumstances, where he had no notice of the rule and had not agreed to observe it;[72] and whether he had actual knowledge thereof, and expressly or by conduct impliedly agreed to comply therewith, are questions to be resolved from the facts and circumstances of the particular case.[73] Generally his assent may be inferred from his knowledge of the rule, and his continuance in the employment without objection thereto;[74] but mere knowledge of such a rule does not conclusively, and as a matter of law, show such assent.[75] If the engagement is for an indefinite term and the provisions of the contract do not interfere, a regulation providing for forfeiture of wages under stated circumstances may be made at any time and will be binding on the employee as soon as he has knowledge of it, and can be taken to have assented thereto.[76]

Deduction of union dues. An employer's practice of deducting union dues and fees from the wages of employees, known as the "checkoff," is a contractual expedient,[77] his obligation to do so arising only by virtue of contract,[78] and the destination of the funds deducted, as well as the rights appertaining to their eventual use, are likewise created and governed by contract.[79] The agreement for the checkoff is deemed the joint and several contract of the members of the union made for them by their agents;[80] the employer, although a contracting principal, also becomes the agent of the union and of the union employees for the purpose of making such deductions and transmittals.[81]

b. Validity, Construction, and Operation

Provisions for deductions from, or forfeiture of, an employee's wages will be enforced only if reasonable; they are to be strictly construed against the employer, and a discretion given an employer to enforce a forfeiture must be exercised reasonably and in good faith.

Provisions for deductions from, or forfeiture of, an employee's wages will not be enforced if unreasonable or oppressive;[82] if reasonable and duly proportioned to the wages received, they will be.[83]

Under some authorities a provision for forfeiture of all wages due to the employee on breach of his agreement, without regard to their amount, will not be enforced[84] unless, under the provisions of the contract, the forfeiture of all wages due can be construed to except from its operation wages earned and unpaid through prior default of the employer;[85] but there is also authority to the contrary.[86]

Construction in general. Provisions for the forfeiture of wages are to be strictly construed against the employer.[87] Where the forfeiture clause obviously is intended by the parties to apply to either of two contingencies named, it will be so construed, even though on a literal interpretation it applies to one only.[88] Where a provision making the employee responsible for part of the amount charged by him to customers, in lieu of cash payment, is contained in an instrument signed only by him, and not in another instrument signed only by the employer, the two instruments will be read together and the provision given effect.[89]

Discretion of employer. A forfeiture enforceable in the discretion of the employer implies that the exercise of that discretion shall be reasonable and in good faith.[90] Such a provision is to be strictly construed, and conditions named in the contract as justifying a declaration of forfeiture will not be extended beyond the fair meaning of the words used.[91] Thus, where the discretion is placed with a certain officer in the employ of a corporation, it cannot be exercised by some other officer.[92] A provision that the employer may retain part of the employee's wages until the contract is fulfilled to the employer's "entire satisfaction" must be construed to mean "reasonable" satisfaction.[93]

Operation in general. While a forfeiture clause may result in the loss by the employee of certain rights which the contract would otherwise give him, it does not necessarily operate to deprive him of his right to recover for his services on a quantum meruit.[94] A forfeiture clause applies to the employee's acts or failures to act during the term of his employment and not to acts after his discharge.[95]

A checkoff of union dues has been held to be an appropriate matter to be covered by a collective bargaining agreement,[96] and a provision for a checkoff has been held to be valid and enforceable.[97] Where an employee's agreement authorizing his employer to deduct union dues from his wages is indefinite as to time, it is revocable at will,[98] and a deduction made after revocation is unauthorized.[99]

gardless of the employer's default in payment or his loss from the breach is not enforceable. Where the contract provides for the allowance of deductions for time lost due to reasons specifically stated in the contract, a deduction may not be made for failure actually to perform due to other causes than those stated, provided there is readiness to perform.[2]

b. Sickness, Death, or Other Disability

In the absence of contractual provisions fixing the rights of the parties, damages or deductions ordinarily are allowed for the unperformed part of a contract of service where the employee dies within the term, or for the time lost during sickness or other disability; but some authorities permit no deduction where the disability is of short duration.

Ordinarily damages or deductions are allowed for the unperformed part of a contract of service where the employee dies within the term,[3] or for the time which he loses during his sickness[4] or other disability,[5] unless it is the result of injuries to an employee in the line of his duty due to the negligence or other fault of the employer, and the employee himself is free from blame.[6] However, under some authorities, in the absence of agreement making other provision, no deductions are to be made where the employee's disability is of short duration.[7]

Where the contract itself in express terms fixes the rights of the parties in case of the death[8] or sickness[9] of the employee, the rights of the parties are controlled thereby. These rights may also be determined by the rules of the employer binding on the employee.[10]

c. Leaving without Notice

Deductions from wages may be made for the damages suffered by an employer due to the employee's leaving his service without notice, if the contract requires such notice to be given, but not where the contract provides otherwise.

Deductions from wages may be made for the damages suffered by an employer due to the employee's leaving his service without notice, if the contract requires such notice to be given,[11] but not where the contract provides otherwise.[12] A provision for a forfeiture of wages, on quitting the service without cause and without giving a specified notice, where not unreasonable or oppressive, will be enforced as a provision for liquidating damages[13] even though there is no corresponding undertaking on the part of the employer to give notice before he dismisses[14] and notwithstanding the existence of a statute requiring that employees shall be paid weekly and providing for their payment in case of discharge or abandonment of the employment.[15] Such provisions are expressly authorized by statute in some jurisdictions.[16] The forfeiture is not enforced if the employee leaves the service for justifiable cause,[17] or without knowledge of the rule of the employer requiring notice,[18] or where the leaving is not voluntary,[19] or is due to sickness,[20] especially where the employee notifies his employer that he is sick and then is absent only so long as he is unable to work.[21] Likewise forfeiture may not be enforced where there is a mere temporary absence not constituting an abandonment[22] unless the employer might reasonably regard the employee's leaving and continued absence as an abandonment of the work, rendering it necessary to procure another to supply his place,[23] since abandonment is a matter of the acts of the employee and not of his undisclosed intentions.[24]

Offer to return. An employee who has abandoned the service without cause and forfeited his wages thereby cannot claim a right to them by showing that he later offered to return where the employer refused to reinstate him.[25]

§ 105. —— Negligence or Misconduct

a. As precluding recovery
b. As ground for deductions

a. As Precluding Recovery

An employee's recovery of wages under the contract may be prevented by his misconduct, fraud, commission of a criminal act, or disloyalty in a manner substantially affecting the employment contract.

A breach of the contract of employment other than by quitting the service may prevent a recovery of any wages thereunder, or of wages for the remainder of the term,[26] as where the employee is guilty of gross misconduct, or misconduct substantially affecting the contract of employment, in the course of his employment,[27] or has practiced intentional fraud on his employer,[28] or has proved disloyal to him[29] in a manner substantially affecting the contract of employment,[30] or has assaulted his employer,[31] or has falsified his accounts,[32] or has stolen or embezzled the money of his employer,[33] or committed other criminal offenses, although not immediately injurious to the person or property of the employer.[34]

The rule has been modified in some decisions in its application to contracts where the services rendered are severable, to the extent of disallowing a recovery only with respect to services affected by the improper acts, and allowing a recovery for the others;[35] so an employee's willful misconduct during a particular year has been held not to forfeit his right to compensation for a prior year during which he performed services for which compensation can be apportioned.[36] Further, a recovery on a quantum meruit has been allowed in some instances.[37]

It is not disloyalty, resulting in a forfeiture of wages earned, for an employee to have a mere difference of opinion with his employer as to the wisdom of certain details in the management of his employer's business,[38] or to confer with a competitor of his employer if he does nothing detrimental to the interests of his employer,[39] or to leave his employer at any time where, under the employment contract, he has a right to do so and to approach customers of his former employer with a view to

Performance to best of ability
Provisions of employment contracts that employees should perform their duties to "best of their ability" did not permit their use of less than ordinary ability in carrying out such duties, but required them to devote to business ability suggested by their previous long experience in such work, so as to preclude their recovery of compensation for remainder of contract terms after their discharge for failure to perform their contractual obligations to best of their ability.—Walters v. diverting their trade to a competitor,[40] or, when his employment is about to expire, to attempt to secure a selling agency privilege enjoyed by his employer on the expiration of the latter's contract rights thereto.[41]

After part performance. A breach, after part performance of the employment contract, where it does not go to the essence of the contract, will not prevent a recovery thereon,[42] except where the breach was willful and intentional.[43] If the employee has failed to perform the contract according to its terms, but the employer has received the benefit of the labor which exceeds the damage resulting from the breach of the contract, a recovery on a quantum meruit ordinarily is permissible;[44] and this is true whether the labor was received by the assent of the employer before the breach or whether it was received after the performance of all the work which was in fact done.[45]

b. As Ground for Deductions

Losses occasioned by an employee's negligence or want of skill may be deducted from his wages, but not losses due to causes not within his control or due in part to the employer's act; nor may a deduction be made for unskilled performance where he was employed with knowledge of his lack of skill.

Deductions from an employee's wages may be made to cover losses occasioned by his negligence or want of skill,[46] but not for losses due to causes over which the employee had no control[47] or due in part to the employer's act;[48] nor can the master withhold an amount fixed arbitrarily and bearing no relation to the damage.[49]

The master is not entitled to withhold wages because of unskillful performance where he employed the servant knowing his lack of skill.[50] Likewise, wages may not be withheld where the employer's rules authorize deductions to be made only from the wages of a certain class of employees, and the particular employee does not belong to that class.[51]

The employee may not claim the full compensation for such services as are performed with care and skill, if it is needed in part to make good the loss resulting from other work unskillfully or negligently done.[52] If the latter equals or is in excess of the total amount of wages earned, the employee can recover nothing for his labor.[53]

§ 106. —— Waiver by Employer of Right to Deductions or Forfeitures

An employer's right to claim a forfeiture of, or deduction from, an employee's wages may be waived by acts inconsistent therewith, as by his express or implied consent to, or acquiescence in, the employee's breach of contract.

The right to claim a forfeiture of or deduction from, an employee's wages for the breach of his contract may be waived by acts of the employer inconsistent therewith.[54] A waiver cannot be inferred from the employer's acts, however, if he had no knowledge[55] or no opportunity to know,[56] of his employee's breach. The employer's right to enforce a forfeiture for breach of the employment contract is waived by his consent thereto, or acquiescence therein,[57] or by conduct or practice from which such consent or acquiescence may reasonably be inferred.[58] An employer who refuses for other rea-

Where employer alleges a wrongful solicitation of business by using information obtained by employee in the course of his employment as a defense to claim for wages or profits, the courts distinguish between the case of a former employee soliciting customers of his former employer who are openly engaged in business in advertised locations and his soliciting unadvertised customers who became known to the employee only because of information obtained during his employment.—Kleinfeld v. 39 C.J. p 168 note 44.

sons to accept services offered loses his right to object that the services offered were unsatisfactory.[59]

Retention in employment. A continuance by the employer of an employee in his service with knowledge of his breach of the employment contract constitutes a waiver of the forfeiture of wages where, under the circumstances, it is inconsistent with an intention to insist on the forfeiture;[60] otherwise it does not constitute a waiver.[61] Where the contract of employment provides for a forfeiture of wages if the employee becomes intoxicated, a failure to discharge the employee for his first offense will not operate as a waiver of the employer's right to discharge for later offenses.[62]

Offer to pay, or payment of, wages. Voluntary payments of wages during the time of, or after, the employee's breach, with knowledge thereof on the part of the employer, precludes the latter's right to deduct therefor on the final settlement,[63] unless, from the nature of the employment and the terms of the contract, such payment is consistent with an intention to exact full performance.[64] So the right to declare a forfeiture may be waived by a tender of payment in full for the services,[65] or by a tender of judgment in a suit for the wages,[66] or the giving of a note for the wages earned,[67] or by an offer to pay pro rata wages earned up to the time of leaving,[68] even though the offer postpones the payment to the end of the employment term,[69] unless the offer is refused[70] or is made conditional and the condition is refused.[71] It has been both affirmed[72] and denied[73] that a promise to pay forfeited wages must be supported by a legal consideration in order to bind the employer.

§ 107. Penalties Imposed on Employer

Where a contract provides for payment of a penalty by the employer on violating certain contract obligations, the parties' rights are determined by the terms of the contract.

Where a contract of employment itself provides for the payment of a penalty by the employer on violation of certain contract obligations, the rights of the parties are determined by the terms of the contract.[74]

§ 108. Waiver by, or Estoppel of, Employee

An employee's acceptance of wage payments does not necessarily bar his right to claim additional compensation, although it will if he accepts them without objection knowing that the employer regards them as payments in full.

An employee does not waive his right to compensation by neglecting to demand it when due[75] or by a failure to take exception to an erroneous statement as to the amount due contained in a letter to him from the employer;[76] and his previous acceptance of wage or salary payments does not necessarily bar his right to claim additional compensation.[77]

An employee who offers evidence that he refrained from taking his full salary from month to month without any intention of waiving the balance is not estopped to demand or sue for such unpaid balance;[78] likewise an employee is not precluded from showing that there was an understanding that, while the payments were present satisfaction for such wages as he was to receive in money, the employer agreed later on to make up and pay in some manner the difference between such payments and the real value of the employee's services.[79]

On the other hand, an employee cannot claim wages in excess of the amount already received from his employer for which he has given a receipt in full for services performed,[80] or which he has accepted without objection knowing that his employer regards them as payment in full,[81] or where the amount received is based on monthly accounts which he himself has presented[82] or which his employer has rendered and in which he has acquiesced;[83] and an employee waives his claim for commissions by abandoning such claim when it appears that his overdrafts exceeded his commissions.[84] An express waiver or release of rights to additional compensation is not ineffective or without consideration because not all of the fixed compensation due under the contract has been paid.[85]

Whether a receipt for compensation, given by an employee, constitutes a waiver or release depends on the circumstances under which it was given;[86] likewise a release without consideration creates no estoppel.[87] The employee is not bound by a recital in a receipt for wages admittedly due, releasing the employer from all future responsibility under the unterminated contract of employment.[88]

Evidence raising a presumption of acquiescence on the part of the employee may be rebutted by other evidence negativing an estoppel,[89] as where it is shown that a receipt for wages has been fraudulently procured,[90] or that the receipt is for salary and that the employee's claim is for commissions,[91] or that the receipt is for services before discharge and that the employee's claim is for wages accruing after the discharge.[92]

Release or waiver not shown
Where employees of bankrupt continued to work while their representative was making efforts to procure revised terms, the fact that employees signed pay envelopes containing statement showing time period, amount due, rate of pay, and deductions and accepted pay checks at old rate, was not the equivalent of giving releases or waiver of their claims for additional compensation.—Martin v. Oral insistence on rights under contract
Where written employment contract provided for payment of bonus to employee, and early in one year employer advised employee orally that he would not receive bonus for that year, and the employee received no more monthly bonus slips showing amount of bonus for each month, but not mentioned in contract, employee who orally insisted on his rights under the written contract and continued working did not waive his right to bonus and was not estopped to enforce the written contract.—Albert-Ross Refrigerator & Fixture Co. v. 92. La.—Wells v. Sherrill Hardwood Lumber Co., 92 So. 706, 151 La. 1081.

Waiver or estoppel under minimum wage statutes is discussed infra §§ 151–153.

An employee who voluntarily resigns his position thereby waives his right to a continuance of his pay;[93] nor can he recover a deposit in the hands of his employer on the ground that it is a part of the compensation for his services where he has already sued for and recovered their reasonable value.[94]

Continuing in employment; reinstatement. Where an employee continues in the employment after the employer's failure to furnish work for a part of the service period contracted for, he does not waive his right to recover the amount due him under the contract for the period for which he was refused work.[95] An employee's acceptance of reinstatement in his employer's service does not constitute a waiver of his right to recover back pay for the time during which he was wrongfully deprived of employment,[96] particularly where at all times he asserted such claim.[97]

Overtime. An employee has been held estopped to claim compensation for overtime work where he never reported it, or advised his employer that he expected compensation for it, until he instituted suit after his discharge.[98]

2. Amount

§ 109. Where Not Fixed by Contract

Where the compensation of an employee is not fixed by contract, he is entitled to recover the reasonable value of his services.

An employee is entitled to recover the reasonable value of his services if the contract of employment does not fix the amount of compensation,[99] or if the contract does fix the amount but, because of the employer's breach, the employee is entitled to treat the contract as having been rescinded by his employer,[1] or if the contract contains a provision for the later determination of the amount and the provision is not carried out[2] or is carried out by agreeing that a reasonable amount shall be paid.[3] A provision that the employee's compensation shall be a limited amount for a probationary period, if at the end of that time his services do not prove satisfactory, permits a recovery beyond the limited amount and equaling the reasonable value of his services if he is discharged on other grounds than dissatisfaction with his work.[4]

Intention of parties. The intention and expectation of the parties as to compensation, expressed in general terms, in so far as they are made a part of the contract by the evidence in the case, are to be taken into consideration and followed in determining the amount recoverable,[5] but a general intention and expectation, not incorporated in the con-

Implied promise to pay reasonable worth
Where employer accepts services of employee for any period of time, the law implies a promise to pay what such services are reasonably worth, unless it is understood that services are to be rendered gratuitously or unless they are rendered under circumstances which repel the presumption.—Gillespie Land & Irr. Union wage Provision of alleged oral contract of lifetime employment, entered into in consideration of employee returning to work during pendency of strike, that such employment should be at same wages received by employee previous to strike, was intended by both parties to mean the union wage based on character of work employee was performing at time of strike.—Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Foar, C.C.A.Ind., 84 F.2d 67.

Growth of business
Where plaintiff was engaged to manage a secondhand store purchased by defendant under an arrangement that plaintiff was to take out enough to cover his living expenses, and that when business grew sufficiently to justify it, he was to receive more, implicit in the arrangement was an understanding that plaintiff was to receive a reasonable compensation for his services if and when the business warranted it, and, where he built the business up, he was entitled to reasonable compensation for his services.—Jeffs v. Stephenson, 114 P.2d 987, 9 Wash.2d 335.

tract, cannot be made the basis of a recovery.[6]

Benefits received by employer. Where the services rendered by the employee are of such a nature that their value is customarily measured by reference to the benefits received by the employer, the extent and value of those benefits are to be taken into account in determining the reasonable value to be placed on such services.[7] Where, however, the benefits received are merely incidental, and an adequate measure of value is to be found in the character of the service itself, the award must be based on the character of the service independently of the benefits received.[8]

Known characteristics of employee's work. Where one employs a person whom he knows to possess certain outstanding characteristics affecting the quality of his work, without any express agreement as to compensation, and afterward accepts the work, a promise to pay the customary charges of that particular employee is implied, especially where the work corresponds with the work usually done by him.[9]

Standard of reasonable value generally. If the employee's service can be classified as belonging to a well defined group, the presumption is that the wages ordinarily paid for that class of labor correctly measures the amount recoverable by the employee,[10] and the classification depends on the character of the service called for by the contract rather than on the words used or not used by the parties in defining it.[11] In other words, the amount of compensation to which an employee is entitled will depend on his nominal classification, the type of work performed, the terms of the union or other contract, and any other pertinent circumstances that may be involved.[12] Where the employee's service, although belonging to a well defined class, has other elements of value, due to the circumstances under which it is rendered, other considerations in addition to the ruling rate of wages must be taken into account in determining the reasonable worth of the service[13] unless the contract in express terms stipulates that the employee is to receive merely the wages usually given to employees of that class.[14]

§ 110. Where Fixed by Contract

a. In general
b. Contract rate and time
c. Provision for optional fixing of rate
d. Change in amount

a. In General

Employers and employees may contract as to the amount of compensation to be paid.

As a general rule employees have the right to negotiate with the employer concerning wages and to make such demands as to the amount of wages as to them seems right,[15] and the employer has the right to determine the wages he is willing to pay employees.[16] Ordinarily the employer is entitled to accept or reject the terms of wages proposed by the employees or their representatives,[17] and, on rejection, to decline to continue the employment.[18]

Operation of railroad on scale of wages causing loss is not required.—Schuppan v. Peoria Ry. Terminal Co., D.C.Ill., 9 F.2d 448, affirmed Shuppan v. Peoria Ry. Terminal Co., C.C.A., 30 F.2d 569.

18. Ala.—Welch v. State, 183 So.

Employees may organize trade unions for the purpose of fixing the rate of wages acceptable to them,[19] and ordinarily a contract between a union and an employer concerning the rate of wages to be paid employees is valid[20] and imposes the reciprocal obligation on the union and its members to work in accordance therewith.[21] It has been held that a contract as to wages between a union and an employer may not effectively be modified by the employer and individual employees so as to provide for a different and lower scale of wages,[22] at least without the consent of the union itself.[23]

Where the terms of the employment contract fix the compensation of an employee for his services, such provisions determine the amount of his recovery,[24] irrespective of what the services are actually worth.[25] Accordingly, wherever work is done by one for another for a price named by one and acquiesced in by the other, the amount named is the amount recoverable.[26] It has been held that minimum payment clauses in contracts for services are valid between the parties.[27]

Per cent of fund or income. Where the contract fixes the compensation for services at a certain per cent of a stated fund or income, the wages recoverable will change in amount as the fund or income on which they are based changes.[28]

Amount dependent on conditions affecting payment. If an agreement fixing the rate of wages stipulates that the employees shall work for less than the full rate until the development of the business to a certain point, and that the back wages shall then be paid out of the proceeds available for the purpose, the then existing fund must be divided among those having claims against it, the share of a particular employee, in the absence of any agreement as to priorities, depending on the size of the fund and the proportion the amount due him bears to the aggregate amount of claims.[29]

Baseball agreements. A professional baseball player, under contract fixing his salary, is entitled to the amount named, undiminished, for the period named, provided there has been performance or readiness to perform on his part.[30] This right is not affected by a transfer or "sale" of the player by one club to another,[31] even though under the "National Agreement" of organized baseball the right to transfer, restricted by certain conditions precedent, is given to the employer, and such conditions have been performed.[32]

b. Contract Rate and Time

Where the contract fixes compensation at a specified amount per unit of time, the amount of wages due is to be computed at the contract rate for the period of time specified in the contract.

In the case of a contract fixing compensation at a specified amount per unit of time, the amount which may be recovered is to be computed at the contract rate for the period of time specified in the contract,[33] provided, as discussed supra § 81, there has been a substantial performance or readiness to perform on the part of the employee. The day of employment and the day of discharge are included as entire days in determining the amount due for personal services.[34] Where an employee engages to perform certain work within a specified time for an agreed price, he is entitled to the full price on completion of the work within the period specified.[35]

Sundays. Sundays included within the term of service are to be paid for, where the contract so stipulates,[36] provided the legality of the contract is not affected by any provision therein requiring labor to be performed on Sunday.[37]

Days of actual service. If wages are payable weekly, an employee, starting work in the middle of a week, is entitled to recover wages only for the days actually given to the work.[38] However, he is not restricted in his recovery to payment only for days which he has spent in a particular place,[39] or in the discharge of particular duties,[40] where his employment contemplates other duties to be performed, and in other places.

Coming late and going early. An employee can recover for a full day's work, even though he comes to his work late and leaves early, provided he can show that his employer had knowledge of his practice and acquiesced in it.[41] Where no such acquiescence is shown, however, an employee, contracting to labor a certain number of hours each day must show in substance a full day's work in order to recover a day's pay,[42] and, if he does not show this, it has been held that, in the absence of agreement providing otherwise, he cannot recover for the part of the day when he does work,[43] even though his wages are stated in the contract to be a fixed sum per hour.[44]

Intermittent work. Whether an employee who is not kept at work by his employer for the entire period of his employment may recover for the entire period or only for the time he actually works depends on the terms of the contract, a recovery for the entire time covered by the contract being allowed in some cases,[45] and only for the period of actual service in others.[46]

Work and rate scale. Where the contract provides different wages for different kinds of work, and where it can be construed as providing for an apportionment of the compensation, the amount which the employee can recover depends on the time which he spent in each kind of work.[47]

c. Provision for Optional Fixing of Rate

Where the contract so provides, either the employer or the employee may have the option of fixing the rate of compensation.

Where the contract of employment leaves it to the employer to fix the employee's wages, it has been held that the employee can recover only the amount fixed by his employer, even though it is considerably less than the reasonable value of the service, provided the employer has acted in good faith[48] and provided also he fixes the compensation when the contract requires him to do so[49] or when called on by the employee.[50]

If, under the employment contract, the compensation is to be fixed by the employee, he cannot make an unreasonable and oppressive charge.[51]

d. Change in Amount

The amount of compensation may be changed by mutual agreement.

The employment contract may be supplemented by a later valid agreement between the parties, amounting to a suspension or abrogation of the old contract and nullifying any right of the employee to recover compensation under it;[52] or the modifying contract may merely effect a change in the terms of the original contract relating to compensation, in which case recovery can be had only in the amount stipulated in the later agreement.[53] The modifying agreement must be supported by a consideration.[54]

Increase. In order that an agreement between an employer and his employee for a future increase of wages may be enforceable, it must be certain and explicit[55] and based on a valid consideration,[56] and it has been held that, as a promise made to induce a party to do that which he is already bound to do by contract is without consideration, a mere modification of an existing contract whereby the employee is to receive a larger compensation is unenforceable.[57] However, where the original contract is validly canceled, a new one executed in its place for which the mutual promises are again a consideration is valid and enforceable.[58] It follows that a mere promise of additional compensation made by the employer after the employee has left the service is without consideration and of no effect.[59] If, under its terms, the increase is made dependent on the performance of one or more conditions precedent, the employee, in order to be entitled to the increase, must prove a performance of all the conditions named[60] or the making of a valid new contract entitling him to the increase on the terms named therein.[61]

Decrease. Where an employee is hired for a definite term at a fixed compensation, his employer cannot reduce his compensation during the term without his consent.[62] However, when his consent is once given, the employee is bound and cannot thereafter claim right to the difference between the old and the new wage[63] even though he gave his consent to avoid his discharge.[64]

The rule that wages cannot be reduced within the term without the employee's consent applies equally to employees by the day, week, month, or year,[65] but inasmuch as the employment is for recurring terms the same scale of wages is held to continue from one term to the next[66] until the employee has had actual notice of reduction either di-

Retroactive increase

(1) Where collective bargaining representative and employer reached agreement that increased pay when approved by War Labor Board would be retroactive, and only thing uncertain was effective date of contract by reason of necessity of approval of increase by War Labor Board, employee was entitled to the retroactive pay increase benefits when contract became effective.—McNeil v. Peoples Life Ins. Co., D.C.Mun.App., 43 A.2d 293.

(2) Where a contract between a company and a labor union, providing for a wage increase, provides that the agreement shall be retroactive to, and effective as of, a date almost two years earlier as of which the former collective bargaining agreement had expired, a member of the union, who voluntarily left the company's employment during the period when negotiations were in progress was entitled to be paid the increase from the effective date thereof to the date of the severance of his employment.—McKinley v. rectly from his employer[67] or indirectly through his fellow employees.[68] The employee's continuance in the service after receiving such notice, however, raises an implication of his consent to such reduction from the beginning of a subsequent period[69] although he does not in terms signify such consent[70] or even though he notifies the employer to request his resignation if the reduction is to be put into effect.[71] However, where the facts are such as to show that acquiescence in the reduction is not to be implied from the employee's continuing in the employment under the contract,[72] as where he expressly refuses to assent to the reduction but remains in his employment pending further negotiations with his employer and is allowed by his employer to perform his duties,[73] the employer is liable for such services at the old rate.

Under a contract giving the employer discretion to modify or change in full the compensation for certain work, the judgment so exercised by the employer must be free from fraud or mistake in order to permit a reduction of compensation.[74] Where a minimum wage has been set by agreement, the employer may not reduce the compensation of an employee below such minimum,[75] but he may reduce the compensation to the minimum set by such contract.[76]

Temporary reduction. Where the modifying agreement contemplates merely a temporary reduction, the old wage scale to be restored on the happening of a contingency named, the employee is entitled to the old wage if the contingency has happened;[77] otherwise he is not.[78]

Protest of charges. An employer who merely protests the size of his employee's charges, but continues accepting his services without giving him notice of a definite reduction, or having an agreement with him as to future charges, is held to have consented to a continuance of the old scale.[79]

§ 111. —— Commissions

Where compensation is in whole or in part in the form of commissions, the amount recoverable and the method of computation are dependent on the terms of the contract.

b. Computation of profits

a. In General

Under an agreement by which profits from the employer's business are to be included as a basis for compensation, the amount recoverable by the employee depends on the intention of the parties as revealed in the contract and by their conduct under it.

The amount recoverable by the employee under an agreement by which profits from the employer's business are to be included as a basis for compensation depends on the intentions of the parties as revealed in their contract and by their conduct under it.[92] Where the agreement provides for payment to the employee of a per cent of the profits, but the parties reach no agreement as to the exact per cent, it has been held that the employee may recover only the reasonable value of his services,[93] but an agreement to pay an employee a per cent of profits within specified limits, such as three to five per cent, has been construed as one to pay a reasonable per cent within such limits.[94] An employee who has by way of monthly advancements received more than the per cent of the profits provided for by the contract is entitled to no additional compensation.[95]

Interest on share of profits. Ordinarily the employee is entitled to interest on profits belonging to him and remaining in the hands of his employer after their payment to the employee is due.[96]

b. Computation of Profits

(1) In general
(2) Time for computation
(3) Expenditures and deductions
(4) Employer's statement of profits and losses
(5) Averaging profits and losses
(6) Termination of employment

(1) In General

The term "profits" as used in an agreement by which profits are included as a basis for compensation should be construed in accordance with the language of the contract and the surrounding conditions and circumstances, and generally means that which remains of the gross receipts of the business after all legitimate expenses and business losses have been deducted.

In construing the term "profits," under an agreement by which profits are included as a basis for compensation, the court should consider the language used in the contract in connection with the conditions and circumstances under which the parties were contracting,[97] and, where the contract gives to the term "net" or "net profits" a special and restricted meaning, the expressed intention of the parties controls.[98] Generally, however, the profits[99] or net profits[1] of a "business," as the term is used in employment contracts, means that which remains of the gross receipts of an employer's business after all its legitimate expenses have been paid and its business losses have been deducted.[2]

Distinction between actual and "paper profits." The computation is generally based on actual profits so far earned from wholly or partially completed transactions as distinguished from speculative or "paper profits" on unfinished business or outstanding accounts.[3] In profits or net profits on sales, the computation is based on actual profits on completed sales as distinguished from estimated profits on unsold goods[4] even though extended credits are involved.[5] In net profits arising out of transactions, each one of which covers an extended period of time, as in the case of building operations, the computation is made on the basis of the part completed at the end of the particular computation period[6] even though the bookkeeping methods of the employer make no account of the profits earned until the completion of the contract and the receipt of all payments under it.[7] Here too, however, the terms of the contract clearly revealing the intention of the parties will control.[8]

Estimates of financial condition. The profits indicated by a mere estimate of the employer's financial condition at a particular time do not afford a basis for a computation legally binding where the contract stipulates that it shall be based on the balancing of the employer's books in such a way as to exhibit the precise condition of each account and the actual state of his business.[9]

Canceled sales. It has been held that an employer's unliquidated demand for damages against a third person for breach of a contract of sale may be regarded as an element in net profits even though the item would not have gone into the computation until a later time if there had been no breach of contract.[10]

(2) Time for Computation

The time as of which profits should be computed for the purpose of determining the amount due an employee under agreements to pay him a per cent of profits depends on the provisions of the contract of employment.

The terms of the contract in the light of the circumstances surrounding its execution control in determining at what time or times the computation of profits, for the purpose of determining the amount due an employee, is to be made.[11] Ordinarily the employee is entitled to have the computation made at the stated time notwithstanding the existence of doubtful accounts outstanding,[12] such accounts either being deducted in toto from the receipts of that time[13] or carried into the statement of profits for the year, where it is the employer's custom acquiesced in by the employee to do so and to deduct the losses sustained on liquidation during the year of credit sales made in previous years.[14] In computing the net income of which plaintiff is to receive a certain per cent, he is entitled to have included in the computation the total income earned during the period covered even though part of it may not have been received until after the termination of his employment.[15]

(3) Expenditures and Deductions

Where an employment contract provides for profit sharing, all legitimate expenses reasonably involved in the cost of doing business and within the contemplation of the contract are deductible in computing the net income in which an employee is entitled to share.

Under the rule requiring the deduction of legitimate expenses in computing the net income in which an employee is entitled to share, "legitimate expenses" are expenditures, actually made,[16] which can reasonably be said to enter into the cost of carrying on the business of the employer[17] during the period of the employee's service,[18] or a part thereof constituting one of the employer's fiscal periods.[19] Where the contract specifies the expenses to be deducted, its provisions will control,[20] the court following the construction of the contract in this respect by the parties themselves where their conduct is consistent with the terms used.[21] In the

Rule of practical construction
Where manager, who was paid a monthly salary and also all monthly profits over a certain amount, was customarily paid his per cent of profits four to six weeks after end of the month, court, in determining when manager was entitled to receive his per cent of monthly profits, properly invoked practical construction rule.—Sayre v. absence of express provision in the contract, the particular items which are or are not deductible in determining net profits, and the method of figuring profits in cases where an employee is entitled to share therein, must be determined in the light of the circumstances.[22]

The fact that expenses exceed those of other years will not preclude their deduction provided they are actual and legitimate in character.[23] Where the employee's per cent is computed on the amount by which profits for the year exceed those for a preceding year, all deductions for the year should be made on the same basis as those for such preceding year.[24]

Materials and stocks of goods. The cost of materials consumed in the operation of the business is a proper item of expense,[25] but the employee is entitled to the benefit of all discounts secured by the employer in paying cash for the material,[26] in the absence of express provision in the contract to the contrary,[27] and credit must be given him for the amount of overcharges by the employer for materials furnished.[28] On the other hand, material and labor furnished to the employee for his private use is chargeable against him and cannot be considered as an expense of the employer's business in the absence of the employer's consent or acquiescence.[29]

Where profits are to be calculated on the sale of goods, in estimating the cost of the goods a deduction is properly made for cash discounts availed of by the employer in purchasing the goods.[30] Depreciation in a stock of goods may be allowed as an expense.[31] This item is not cumulative through successive periods as in the case of plant depreciation but is figured at the end of each period at a certain amount to be deducted from the cost price of the goods then in stock.[32] Likewise it is not necessary in order to show good faith in the employer, where, under the terms of the contract, he is given a right to determine conclusively the amount to be deducted, that a fixed per cent of depreciation should be adopted and applied, but rather that the rule adopted should be as constant as practicable with reference to the amount and nature of the goods in stock.[33]

Overhead generally. If the employee is entitled to a share of the net profits from the entire business of the employer, it may be said in a general way that all expenses entering into its overhead cost may be deducted.[34] If, however, the employee is entitled merely to a share of the net profits from certain transactions connected with the employer's business, it has been held that only the expenses directly connected with those transactions can be deducted, and that the general charges incident to the management of the employer's business are not properly included.[35]

Plant and equipment. It has been held that deductions from income may not be allowed for money expended by an employer for the erection of a plant,[36] for the moving of his plant from one place

Expense of bidding

In computing net profits derived by corporation from subway construction contract to a per cent of which engineers employed in the construction work were entitled, there should be no deduction for the expense of bidding on other jobs.—Martin v. In employee's action for accounting based on contract for share of net profits of business, with a provision that defendant was to furnish necessary money to carry on the business and, as consideration therefor he was to receive all cash discounts on material furnished, a special trade discount by company having no sales representative in territory was not a "cash discount" within meaning of contract.—Altendorf v. to another,[37] or for the installation of permanent improvements,[38] or for the purchase of equipment.[39]

It has been held that deterioration in value of the employer's plant cannot be allowed as an expense in the absence of an agreement to that effect,[40] but it has also been held that, where such an agreement can be implied from the conduct of the parties indicating a knowledge of, or an acquiescence in, the practice of charging off a certain amount each year for depreciation, such charge may be allowed in computing the net profits for the year[41] where the charge is itself reasonable.[42] Under a provision of the contract authorizing a charge for depreciation of the plant as an expense of the business, taking the "reasonable value" of the plant at the beginning and end of the work as the basis for computation, the words "reasonable value" have been construed to mean not the value of the plant as secondhand equipment, but its utility value to the employer.[43]

The expenses of ordinary upkeep and repair of a plant and its equipment should be taken out of the gross income of the business in order to determine the net profits, if any.[44] Deductions may also be made for tools and implements worn out[45] and for the depreciation by wear and tear or other necessary causes of such of the tools, implements, and appliances as were not rendered absolutely worthless.[46]

Cost of power for a manufacturing plant may be deducted as an expense as long as the price charged therefor is reasonable,[47] especially where the parties to the contract have so agreed.[48] A sum which represents the value of the use of permanent improvements may be allowed as a legitimate expense of the business.[49]

Interest, rent, and insurance. Where the employee consents[50] or acquiesces,[51] interest on capital invested may be charged as an expense of the business; otherwise it may not be[52] even though the employers agree as between themselves that it shall be so entered.[53] It has been held that interest on money borrowed for the purposes of the business

Capital assets

(1) Where contract provided that plaintiff's compensation for services rendered in operation of a truck venture was a fixed sum per month plus a per cent of net profits, in determining net profits in accounting action the cost of capital assets acquired such as motor trucks and railroad commission's permit were improperly charged to expenses, since cost thereof should be allocated to net profits.—Giles v. Rayburn, Tex.Civ.App., 173 S.W.2d 371.

(2) Fact that engineer, who was entitled to a per cent of profits derived by corporation from construction contracts, participated in conferences at which it was suggested that equipment remaining after completion of such contracts be sold at public auction, did not indicate engineer's consent that proceeds of such sale should be accepted as basis for determining net profits under the contract, where primary purpose was to determine most efficient way of liquidating remaining assets of corporation after its officers had determined to dissolve and retire from business.—Martin v. City of New York, 35 N.Y.S.2d 182, 264 App.Div. 234, appeal denied 37 N.Y.S.2d 426, 265 App.Div. 806, resettlement granted 37 N.Y.S.2d 838, 265 App.Div. 816. Motion granted Martin v. In determining net profits derived by corporation from subway construction contracts so as to compute additional compensation to which engineers employed in the work were entitled, the cost of all capital assets actually and totally consumed in the work plus a reasonable allowance for the depreciation of those capital assets still in existence when construction contracts were completed should be deducted as an expense.—Martin v. City of New York, 35 N.Y.S.2d 182, 264 App.Div. 234, appeal denied 37 N.Y.S.2d 426, 265 App. Div. 806, resettlement granted 37 N.Y.S.2d 838, 265 App.Div. 816, motion granted Martin v. is not deductible,[54] but it has also been held that such interest is a necessary item of expense deductible from total income,[55] and that interest on money used to hold a stock of goods for a favorable market may be allowed.[56]

Rent of the premises in which the business is carried on is properly chargeable as an expense,[57] but if the property is owned by the employer no allowances on this account will be made in the absence of evidence showing its fair rental value.[58]

Life insurance premiums paid by an employer for insurance on his own life, essential to secure a balance borrowed for purchase of his business, have been held not a proper deduction in computing the profits of which the employee is to receive a per cent;[59] but premiums paid to secure insurance on the lives of corporate officers have been allowed as proper deductions where the policies were deposited as additional collateral to secure loans required in connection with the work.[60]

Salaries and other compensation. In the absence of a provision of the contract permitting it, the employer cannot charge as an expense of the business his own salary[61] or payments to himself because of profits.[62] Where the contract expressly[63] or by implication[64] permits it, the deduction may be made, but a provision allowing it will be strictly construed.[65]

Where the parties agree to the deduction of the employee's salary[66] or advances to him,[67] their intention will prevail. In the absence of express agreement the determination of the question whether fixed payments to the employee are deductible depends on whether the payments are or are not a part of the profits. If they are, they cannot be deducted as expenses.[68] If they are not payable out of profits, they are to be deducted as expenses.[69] Where the contract provides in express terms for payment of a per cent of profits to the employee less his guaranteed salary such salary is not deductible as a "legitimate expense."[70]

Salaries paid to other employees may be deducted,[71] especially where their employment is known to, and acquiesced in, by the employee entitled to a share of the profits.[72] Where compensation to another employee has been withheld, it is not deductible,[73] nor is it deductible where paid during a period other than that involved.[74]

Rebates and gratuities. Rebates allowed to the employer's customer may be charged as expenses of the business provided in making them the employer acted in good faith and according to his best judgment.[75] However, discounts not taken advantage of by customers to which goods were sold are not chargeable against the employee in calculating profits.[76] Gratuities paid by an employer to a third person cannot be deducted as expenses in the absence of proof that they were beneficial to the employer or that such payments were necessary or justifiable on business principles.[77]

Claims and expenses of litigation. Uncollectable[78] or doubtful[79] accounts are properly chargeable as expenses provided they have been previously carried into the accounts as assets.[80] This is true even where the contract provides that the employee, who is given a share in the net profits, shall not be liable for any losses sustained in carrying on the business.[81] On the other hand, unliquidated claims or damages in pending actions brought against the employer are not chargeable,[82] the computation being made independently of pending suits.[83]

Cost of litigation reasonably required to maintain the operation of the employer's business and to conserve profits is properly chargeable as an operating expense.[84] Where the employer's business is being liquidated, an employee entitled to a share of the profits is not chargeable with loss due to depreciation in property furnished by the employer for the business and still owned by him individually after the liquidation.[85]

Taxes and limitations on war profits. Federal income[86] and excess profit[87] taxes imposed on the business have been regarded as deductible expenses in computing the profits in which an employee is to share; but there is also authority denying the right to deduct the excess profits tax where the contract of employment was made before enactment of the taxing act and where the amount of the employee's commission was itself deductible as an item of expense for tax purposes.[88] The personal income tax of an employer is not regarded as an expense of his doing business as an individual, and in the absence of assent of the employee has been held nondeductible.[89]

Limitation on profits placed by the government on certain industries during the war places a limitation on the fund available for the computation of an employee's share in the net profits; excess profits over the fixed limit must be deducted from gross profits, not as an operating expense, but as earnings which the employer is not entitled to keep, and the computation made on the balance.[90]

(4) Employer's Statement of Profits and Losses

An employer's statement of profits and losses may be made conclusive by contract if rendered in good faith.

Generally the employer's statement of profits and losses of his business is to be regarded as final and conclusive between the parties as to the amount of profits in which the employee is to share where the contract so provides,[91] and, where the contract can

Notice of accounting practices
Under contract providing that employee should receive per cent of profits to be ascertained by computation made according to employer's standard form of bookkeeping, employee was charged with notice of manner in which employer kept ac-

be so construed, the finality of the statement extends beyond the term of the employee's service.[92] In order for the statement to have this effect, it must be made up in good faith.[93]

(5) Averaging Profits and Losses

Whether or not profits and losses for different periods may be averaged in determining profits under profit-sharing contracts of employment depends on the terms of the contract.

The terms of the contract determine to what extent profits and losses of the employer's fiscal periods, constituting the term of the employee's service, shall be offset one against the other in the computation of net profits in which an employee is to share.[94] As a general rule, averaging is allowed where the final settlement of the employee's share is postponed to the end of his service[95] even though the contract provides for computations to be made periodically during the term.[96] However, averaging is not allowed where the periodic computations within the term are construed as being, each one of them, of the nature of a final settlement, pro tanto, conclusive between the parties,[97] as where the employee's compensation is declared to be payable periodically out of,[98] or is otherwise made dependent on the existence of,[99] net profits for such period.

Where the contract expressly provides that the losses of one period shall be charged against the profits of other periods, the question whether they can be charged only against future profitable periods or against past profitable periods as well depends on the terms of the contract, the charging of losses of one period against profits of another being restricted to subsequent periods where the contract in terms makes the periodic settlements final.[1]

(6) Termination of Employment

Ordinarily an employee entitled to a per cent of the profits may on termination of his employment within a compensation period recover his share of profits earned up to the date of termination.

An employee whose compensation under the contract is measured by the profits of his employer's business, on terminating his employment within one of the computation periods, may recover a share of the profits for that period proportionate to his term of service where the contract expressly or by implication so provides,[2] or where the termination of the employment is under circumstances entitling him to compensation under the contract and at the contract rate for services rendered,[3] unless the contract in terms provides a different method for compensating him in such a contingency.[4] On termination of the employment by the employer, pursuant to option, the employee is entitled to participate in the proportion of profits earned up to the date of termination and no more;[5] but where the employee is discharged wrongfully and without justifiable

Practice to compute annually
Where oral contract of employment for five years as plantation manager provided for monthly salary and for per cent of operational profits, and first year's losses exceeded subsequent four years' profits, profits, in view of custom and practice and parties' testimony, were computable annually and not on entirety basis, and hence manager was not barred from recovering per cent of profits.—Crow v. cause he may be entitled to his agreed per cent of profits for the entire term of the contract.[6]

The amount recoverable as the employee's share of profits up to the time of termination of the employment ordinarily is based on an average of the profits for the entire period, where the contract expressly or by implication so provides[7] or in the absence of evidence indicating the profits actually earned during the term of service.[8] Where it becomes impossible to take the profits of the entire period as the basis of computation, the average of profits for a few years immediately preceding the fractional period of service may be taken as the basis in the absence of evidence showing that the profits for that time would have exceeded by any substantial increase those of the preceding years.[9] Under a contract whereby employer and employee share equally in profits and losses and providing for computation at end of each year or at the termination of employment, on termination the employee is entitled to half the proceeds of property purchased with money taken from the office account during the life of the agreement.[10]

§ 113. —— Part Performance

Generally an employee whose service terminates before the scheduled date is entitled to recover the reasonable value of services actually rendered, provided such recovery is not in excess of the contract rate; but under some circumstances recovery may be had at the contract rate.

Where one employed for a definite term abandons the employment for cause, he may recover the reasonable value of his services[11] provided such recovery does not exceed the compensation fixed by the employment contract,[12] or he may recover his pro rata wages.[13] Where the employee has abandoned the service without sufficient excuse, and a recovery in quantum meruit is permitted, as discussed supra § 83, the amount of the recovery is limited to the contract price for the services,[14] minus damages for the loss sustained by the employer from the employee's abandonment.[15]

Discharge with or without cause. In the absence of a contract stipulation to the contrary, it has generally been held that an employee discharged for cause may recover the reasonable value of services actually rendered, not to exceed the contract wage and taking into consideration the damages resulting to the employer from the employee's voluntary or willful failure to perform.[16] However, damages to the employer are not allowed for an imperfect performance justifying the employee's discharge, but which has occurred without any willful intention on the part of the employee to violate the contract,[17] and a recovery of liquidated damages is allowed only to the extent provided for by the contract.[18] The reasonable value of services rendered by the employee up to the time of his discharge is the measure of his recovery where the contract expressly so provides.[19] An employee discharged without cause may be entitled to the agreed per cent of profits for the entire time of service limited by the contract instead of merely for the period of actual work before such discharge, as considered supra § 112 b (6).

Termination by consent or under option. Where the contract has been terminated by mutual consent, the employee may recover for the actual time during which services were rendered at the contract rate[20] although reference must be had to any special provisions relating thereto.[21] Where the contract provides for its termination by the employer on a specified notice, the employee is entitled to his salary only for the period of notice, on refusal of the employer to continue the employment.[22] Also, where the contract provides that either party may terminate it after giving the other a certain number of days' notice, the employee, after notice of termination of the contract has been served on him by the employer, may recover at the contract rate for the time of actual service plus the notice period[23] except that in no event can he recover for a longer time than the entire contract period.[24] So, where the hiring is for an indefinite term and wages at a certain rate are paid periodically, the employee, on the termination of the contract before the end of one of the periods, may recover his wages at the contract rate only for that period.[25]

§ 114. Deductions, Fines, and Forfeitures

The amount of deductions from wages which may or should be made generally depends on the terms of the employment contract or the rules or custom governing the employment.

Where deductions from an employee's wages are authorized, as discussed supra §§ 102–106, the amount to be deducted will be controlled by the contract[26] or rules or custom governing the employment,[27] and ordinarily the amount may not be fixed by an arbitrary standard.[28] Ordinarily, in case of negligence, misconduct, or imperfection in the employee's work, he may recover only what his services are reasonably worth, or the contract price, less the damages resulting therefrom,[29] but it has been held that the employee's default will not deprive him of the right to a credit balance in his favor under a profit-sharing agreement[30] although on an accounting the employee may be charged with whatever loss his breach of contract occasioned.[31] Where the provision for forfeiture is considered as liquidated damages, the employer need not show

§ 115. Where Fixed for Part of Service Only

Where compensation is fixed as to only part of an employee's services, the employee ordinarily is entitled to the contract rate for the part so fixed and to the reasonable value of the other services.

Where services are rendered under an employment fixing the rate for part of them only, the amount of compensation recoverable is computed on the basis of the contract rate for the services so governed and the reasonable value of other services not subject thereto.[33] Where services have been rendered over an extended period with an understanding that they should be paid for, but no agreement as to the rate of compensation is made until the end of the service, when a rate is agreed on covering a part of the service only, the rate agreed on will govern the compensation for similar services during similar periods,[34] but, if the services during similar periods differ, the rate agreed on for one period cannot be made a basis which will control in determining the rate for the other periods.[35]

§ 116. Additional Compensation

Where an employee is entitled to recover additional compensation for extra work, he may recover the amount agreed on, or, in the absence of such an agreement, the reasonable value thereof.

An employee may recover what his employer agreed to pay him for extra work outside the scope of his employment[36] and, in the absence of any stipulated compensation, its reasonable value.[37]

Where the method of computing the amount of bonus to be paid is indicated by the terms of the contract, those terms will control.[38] Whether money paid to the employer, in settlement of canceled contracts, should be carried into the accounts as a profit in computing the amount available for payment of a contract bonus to the employee depends on whether items of cost which the settlement was made to offset have already been carried into the accounts as a loss; if they have been so treated, the amount paid in settlement should appear as a credit.[39]

§ 117. Expenses and Special Damages for Failure to Reimburse

An employee may recover special damages sustained from his employer's wrongful failure to reimburse him for expenses.

An employee, entitled to be reimbursed for expenses, may recover the amount paid out by him, if reasonable, as discussed supra § 100, and also damages for any suffering sustained where such damages are clearly within the reasonable contemplation of the parties as a probable result of the employer's breach of contract.[40]

§ 118. Renewal or Continuance of Employment

In the absence of contrary agreement, a renewal or continuance of employment is usually presumed to be at the rate of compensation specified in the original contract.

Where an employee, hired for a definite term at a fixed price, continues in his employment after the term, without any new contract, it will be presumed that the parties intended that he should be paid the same wages which were payable to him under the original contract,[41] and not their reasonable value under a quantum meruit,[42] and the same rule applies where a seasonal employee renews his service after a period of unemployment intervening without a new agreement as to wages or terms of service.[43] This presumption continues to control as long as the employer accepts the services on that basis[44] and fails to notify the employee of any change,[45] and a mere declaration of intention not to renew, made some time after the termination of the original contract, is not the equivalent of notice within the meaning of the rule.[46]

The presumption of a continuance of the old wages does not arise, however, when, at the end of the original employment term, the parties take up for consideration the terms of employment for the future, and their negotiations are still pending,[47] or where the old contract, which is sought to be used as a basis for the recovery, is not a contract for services to be rendered but merely a settlement of a claim for past services,[48] or where the old contract is made, not at the beginning of the employment, but at some later time, fixing the wages for past, as well as future, services.[49] Likewise the presumption does not arise where the contract under which recovery is sought is construable as one for an indefinite period during which the employee has accepted a lower rate of compensation without protest,[50] or where the employer assigns his contract to a third person, and the employee continues in the service of the assignee without any express agreement between them as to the wages to be paid.[51] The return to work of striking employees has been held sufficient consideration to support their employer's promise that a labor board decision as to the wage rate, to be rendered thereafter, should be retroactive to the date when the employees returned.[52]

Nature of services. The presumption of a continuance of the old wages does not apply where, after the termination of the original contract, the employee renders services which are substantially different than those rendered under the old contract;[53] but a slight change in the character of the services rendered does not have this effect,[54] especially when the employee holds himself in readiness to perform the same services as formerly.[55]

Continuance after attempted modification. Where the parties to a contract terminable at the will of either party carry on unsuccessful negotiations for a modification of the original contract and the employment is later continued on the basis of the old agreement, the attempted modification will not have the effect of a termination of the contract limiting the employee's recovery to that time.[56]

Express renewal contract. Where the parties enter into an agreement to that effect at the beginning of the renewal term, services rendered thereafter will be compensated for at rates different from those specified in the original contract[57] and, by agreement of the parties, the contract may be renewed at an increased rate with a promise of additional pay for past services.[58]

Implication of contract to pay reasonable value

Where employees of bankrupt continued to work while employees' representative was making efforts to procure revised terms, there was a contract implied in fact to pay reasonable value of services unless a new contract definitizing wage-rates should be negotiated, and, in the meantime, employees accepted, merely on account, what was paid them.—Martin v. Campanaro, C.C.A. N.Y., 156 F.2d 127, certiorari denied 67 S.Ct. 112, 329 U.S. 759, 91 L.Ed. ——.

Risk as to terms of new contract

If salesman employed to sell whisky on commission basis continued to work during January and February with knowledge that a new contract would be made effective as of January 1, he took his chance on terms of the new contract in continuing work after that date.—Meyers v. Tardy effort to recover

Where an employee for an indefinite period at a rate of compensation specified as so much less than that paid another employee continues to work for the same money wages after the wages of such other employee have been raised, and does so with knowledge of the facts and without protest, the employee may not after eventual termination of his employment recover the additional compensation to which he would have been entitled under the original contract.—Southern Sav. 3. Time When Compensation Due and Payment

§ 119. Time When Due

a. In general
b. Time of payment not stipulated

a. In General

Generally the time when compensation becomes due and payable to an employee depends on the provisions of the contract of employment.

Subject to statutory regulations as to the time of payment, discussed infra § 156, the time when wages are payable is to be determined by the original contract of hire[59] or subsequent agreements,[60] unaffected by the parties' own construction of their contract if it in terms clearly indicates when payments are to be made.[61]

Payment when convenient. An agreement to pay an employee when convenient to the employer will be construed as an obligation to pay at some time.[62] Where the employer in such case is a company engaged in development work, the time when "convenient" for it to pay has been construed as the time when it becomes a going concern,[63] or when it becomes reasonably apparent that the company will never become a going concern, at which time it will be regarded as "convenient" for the company to pay the employee out of its existing capital assets.[64]

Payment on condition or contingency. Where an employer agrees to pay on the happening of a condition, the happening thereof imposes an absolute requirement of payment,[65] but until such condition has been met there is no right to the compensation.[66] On the other hand, where payment is postponed by the contract to the happening of a contingency, the employee is entitled to his wages after the lapse of a reasonable time where there is an implied understanding that the contingency will happen within a reasonable time;[67] and, where the promise is to pay on completion of work which is subsequently abandoned, the law implies a promise to pay within a reasonable time.[68]

Payment in advance. Wages are not payable in advance, where the contract does not so provide.[69]

Acceleration of payments. The time of payment for services actually rendered is not accelerated by the employee's falling sick[70] or by the employer's denying all liability, on the theory of anticipatory breach,[71] but, as discussed supra § 49, a right of 39 C.J. p 187 note 21.

Provision for irregular payment

Oral contract, under which employee agreed to be paid irregularly and to receive unpaid balance of her compensation when employer should be in a position of financial strength and success, was construable as constituting an agreement to defer part of what became due to employee in order to retain her position, and as deferring payment only while the services were being rendered, so that, on termination of the employment, the remaining wages due the employee became payable, regardless of employer's financial condition at that time.—McDonald v. Texcraft Products Co., 20 A.2d 638, 91 N.H. 411.

62. Colo.—Royal Tiger Mines Co. v. Ahearn, 47 P.2d 692, 97 Colo. 116.

Reasonable time

Contract provision leaving time of payment of part of salary to employer's treasurer did not justify contention that such balance was not to be paid at all, either because the contract was too vague to be enforceable or because the treasurer had not decided to make payment; but, on the contrary, the contract should be construed as providing for payment within a reasonable time.—McCrillis v. L. Q. White Shoe Co., 161 N.E. 902, 264 Mass. 32.

Payment for goods sold on commission

The provision of employment contract that salesman should receive a commission on all sales was executory, and salesman was entitled to commission only after goods had been delivered, accepted, and paid for during period of his employment.—Fate-Root-Heath Co. v. Ceramic Machinery Co., supra.

Termination of employer's contracts

Under contract with company for services to be rendered in operating store for sale of surplus army goods with provision for payment thereunder at termination of existing contracts between company and the United States, termination of contracts between company and the United States was condition precedent to recovery for services.—Georgia Wholesale Co. v. action for wages may accrue immediately on wrongful discharge.

b. Time of Payment Not Stipulated

Where no provision for time of payment is made by contract, compensation of an employee ordinarily becomes due when earned and demanded, or, in the case of employment by the week or month, at the close of each such period.

If no provision for time of payment is made, an employee's compensation is payable on demand as soon as it is earned,[72] but where no demand is made, at the close of the employment.[73] On termination of a contract of employment by mutual consent, and the superseding thereof by another contract, compensation under the first contract becomes payable immediately.[74]

Fixed term. If the hiring is for a fixed term at a specified rate, the contract not stating, however, when the wages are to be paid, they are not payable until the end of the term,[75] unless from the nature of the employment[76] or the conduct of the parties[77] payments within the term are shown to be within the contemplation of the parties, or where under the circumstances the payment at the end of the term would be so unusual as to furnish ground for a presumption of an intended payment within the term.[78]

Implied contracts. Services rendered and accepted on an implied contract must be paid for as soon as rendered.[79]

By the day, week, or month. Wages are payable at the close of each day, week, or month if the employment is by the day, week, or month,[80] the custom of the neighborhood prevailing in the case of employees of a particular class where such custom is shown.[81]

§ 120. Payment

a. In general
b. Form and medium
c. Recovery of payments

a. In General

Ordinarily an employer's liability to his employee ends with payment of the agreed compensation.

In the absence of fraud or duress an employer's obligation to his employee ordinarily ends with payment of the agreed compensation.[82] Payment by an employer to his own agent, however, or to a third person without the employee's consent, as discussed infra § 125, does not bar the employee's claim for wages.

Discounts on advance payments. An employee who accepts less than the amount of wages due in consideration of their payment before they are due is bound thereby,[83] and cannot thereafter recover the amount of the discount on the ground that the advance payment was in violation of the wage assignment statute.[84]

b. Form and Medium

Ordinarily an employee may be paid in any form or medium agreeable to both parties, but in the absence of contract provision to the contrary he is entitled to payment in money.

84. Ind.—Princeton Coal Co. v. Dorth, supra.

Generally an employee's compensation may be paid, in any form agreeable to the parties,[85] subject to statutory provisions governing the medium of payment of wages discussed infra § 157. In the absence of a provision to the contrary in the contract,[86] the employee ordinarily is entitled to payment of his wages in money.[87] The fact that an employee acquiesces in the practice of paying him by check does not show his agreement to accept the check as satisfaction of his claim for compensation irrespective of whether or not he subsequently receives payment on it,[88] and, where a salary check is stolen from the employee and cashed by another on a forged indorsement, it has been held that the employer remains liable for the salary.[89]

Payment in stock. By agreement of the parties, provision may be made for payment of employees in corporate stock.[90] An employee is entitled to payment in stock, computed at its then market value, where the contract provides for the payment of services in stock,[91] and employees agreeing to take stock in a corporation to be organized may refuse it where the corporate property has been mortgaged contrary to the agreement, thus reducing the value of the stock.[92] If the contract provides for payment in cash and stock and limits the employee's entire stockholding to a fixed amount, he is entitled to payment in cash and stock until his entire stockholdings equal the limited amount, and after that to payment entirely in cash.[93]

c. Recovery of Payments

Ordinarily an employer cannot recover back payments of compensation voluntarily made to his employee, as in the case of advances against future commissions.

Generally, where an employer has voluntarily made a payment of wages, he cannot recover it back,[94] even though the employee by his subsequent conduct would have forfeited the right thereto if it had not been made.[95] However, he may recover back any overpayments secured through fraud[96] or mistake.[97] It has also been held that an employer is entitled to recover the unearned portion of an annual bonus where the employee voluntarily quit his position before the end of the contract year.[98]

Advances against commissions. Where the contract of employment provides for advances to the employee, to be charged to, and deducted from, the commissions agreed to be paid to him as the same

Full knowledge of facts

Where salesman entered into a new written agreement with employer each year, which contained same provision, that salesman would be credited with commissions only on merchandise sold to dealers called on by salesman within thirty days before receipt of order, employer, who on yearly settlement with salesman paid commissions without regard to thirty-day provision, could not set off such alleged overpayment of commissions in previous years against commissions earned under a new contract of employment, since payments were voluntarily made by employer with full knowledge of all the facts and without any fraud, duress or extortion by salesman.—Hood v. may accrue, the employer may recover back any excess of advances over the commissions earned, if there is an express[99] or implied[1] agreement to repay such excess, or if by breach of his contract the employee disabled himself from earning the commissions,[2] subject, however, to any provision in the contract guaranteeing to the employee a minimum compensation.[3]

It is generally held that in the absence of either an express or implied agreement or promise to repay advances in excess of commissions earned, the employer has no remedy against the employee,[4] even though the contract in terms provides that there shall be settlements between them monthly;[5] the sole source of reimbursement is the commissions and no personal liability rests on the employee to repay advances.[6] The rule precluding the employer's recovery of excess advances applies where the circumstances are such as to prevent implication of an enforceable promise to repay,[7] and the employee is not liable for repayment notwithstanding the contract in terms provides that the employer agrees "to loan and advance" a fixed amount periodically to the employee, where other provisions in the contract show clearly that the parties regarded the payment as an advance and not as a loan.[8] According to some decisions, however, an employer is entitled to recover advances in excess of the commissions earned even in the absence of an express agreement or promise to repay the excess advances.[9]

Where the employer has agreed to cancel the employee's overdrafts, he cannot recover the amount thereof.[10] Also, where excessive advances are made to an employee under a contract providing for

Where salesman was employed on commission basis but employer guaranteed weekly return of an amount equal to salesman's minimum requirements for living and traveling expenses, salesman's indefinite promise to reimburse employer for advances exceeding commissions if future circumstances permitted it, made after salesman quit, was not an absolute promise to pay as matter of law, and was without consideration and employer could not recover thereon.—Sutton v. a drawing account against commissions, and the parties thereafter enter into a new agreement for compensation, expressly canceling the prior agreement, but making no mention of the amount overdrawn under such prior agreement, the employee is entitled to his salary accruing under the new contract without deducting the overpayment under the original contract.[11]

§ 121. —— Presumptions

Proof of regular and periodic payment of an employee's wages ordinarily raises a presumption of payment in full.

It will be presumed that an employee has been fully paid for his services, where it is shown that he worked under a contract fixing his wages and providing for their payment periodically and that they were regularly paid when due,[12] especially where the payment was accepted without protest or demand for more[13] or was receipted for as wages in full.[14] This presumption of payment follows from a single payment for services for a particular month or other period of time,[15] and extends to all prior periods of service,[16] provided no interval of time has intervened between them,[17] and to all labor or services rendered by an employee similar to his regular duties.[18]

The presumption of full payment may be rebutted by evidence of a subsequent agreement providing for the payment of additional compensation if the employee would continue in the service, and his continuing in the service on those terms.[19] Payment of an employee's wages will not be presumed from the employer's ability to pay and the absence of reasons for his not paying.[20]

Domestic servants and time laborers. The presumption that services have been rendered gratuitously or else that they have been fully paid for is especially applicable to domestic servants[21] and to time laborers[22] who make no demand for further payment until a considerable period after the termination of their services. Such a presumption may be rebutted, however, by evidence tending to show that the services were rendered with an understanding between the parties that they were to be paid for,[23] or that no payment had been made,[24] as, for example, where the employee demands payment and the employer promises to pay at some future time.[25]

The presumption of payment is not rebutted by a failure to allege payment,[26] or by the employee's declarations to third persons that he made frequent demands for money and that the employer refused to pay him the amount he asked for,[27] or by the employer's account book which was not a full record either of his receipts or disbursements, but which contained occasional charges against the employee.[28]

The presumption of payment for domestic services applies not only to domestics living in the house of the employer, but also to employees rendering domestic services but not living in the employer's house,[29] and to those rendering services regarded essentially as domestic services, although called on to render other services not usually associated with the ordinary domestic servant.[30] The rule cannot be invoked where the employer assumes relations of intimacy with his servant, and by what he says and does indicates an intention to marry her.[31]

4. Actions

§ 122. Nature and Form of Remedy

A servant has the right to enforce his claims against his master by an honest resort to the courts. Depending on the circumstances, the action is either on the contract for wages due, or on quantum meruit for the value of the services rendered.

A servant has the right to seek enforcement of his claims against his master by a temperate and honest resort to the courts,[32] even while still in the employ of the master.[33]

The recovery of wages as such should be had in an action for wages based on the contract,[34] at least as long as the contract remains in force.[35] When the employer commits a breach of the employment contract, while the employee may recover the wages due him under the contract,[36] he may also, if he so elects, disregard the contract and sue to recover what his services are reasonably worth,[37] although there is some authority to the contrary on this latter point.[38] Moreover, it has been held that, where the contract is terminated and nothing remains to be done except payment of money, a suit may be maintained on a promise under the common counts.[39] In a proper case an employee may maintain a suit, based on quasi contract, for unjust enrichment.[40]

Actions for breach of employment contracts generally are considered supra § 11 and actions by an employee for wrongful discharge supra §§ 47–59. Actions by employees to recover compensation for use of inventions are considered supra § 73 f. Actions by employees of a corporation against stockholders to enforce the stockholders' statutory liability are considered, together with actions to enforce stockholders' statutory liability to creditors generally, in Corporations §§ 678–705.

Effect of union agreements. Under the Railway Labor Act a single employee suing on his contract of employment to enforce his individual right to recover pay does not sue directly on the collective agreement made between the carrier and a union as a complete contract made for his benefit,[41] but sues on his parol contract of hiring which adopted those terms of the collective agreement which are applicable to him.[42]

Recovery on quantum meruit generally. A recovery on quantum meruit, for the reasonable value of the services rendered, may be had where the employer accepts and benefits by services rendered in anticipation of a formal contract which is never made,[43] or under a contract which is silent as to the amount of wages to be paid,[44] or, as appears in Frauds, Statute of, § 259, under a contract which

Who may institute action on collective bargaining contract generally see supra § 28 (83).

Agreement to pay reasonable compensation
Where employer did not perform promise to pay employee reasonable compensation for inventions turned over to employer, employee could recover under count in indebitatus assumpsit.—Corthell v. Summit Thread Co., 167 A. 79, 132 Me. 94, 92 A.L.R. 1391.

Rate of commission to be arranged
Under contract of employment cannot be enforced because of the statute of frauds. It will not be allowed where suit is brought on the contract to recover the contract wages,[45] or where the services have already been fully paid for under the contract as proved, an alleged agreement to pay an additional amount not being established,[46] or where no services whatever have been rendered because of injuries received by the employee incapacitating him for work under the contract.[47] If, in the latter case, the employer agrees to pay him the usual wages in lieu of damages, the employee's remedy is on the special agreement.[48]

Employment by the day, week, or month. Where an employee is hired and paid by the day, week, or month, on breach of the contract by his employer he may sue on the contract to recover all wages due and unpaid[49] or in quantum meruit for the reasonable value of the services rendered.[50]

Prevention of performance. Where full performance of the contract is prevented by the employer, the employee, if he has fully performed his part of the contract, may sue on the contract[51] or in quantum meruit for the services performed.[52] However, if the employer has prevented the performance of the entire service contracted for, the employee's sole remedy is on the contract.[53]

After discharge for cause. Recovery for services rendered by an employee discharged for cause after part performance, where allowed, must be on the contract in some jurisdictions,[54] in others on a quantum meruit.[55] However, after discharge, whether for or without cause, there can be no recovery on the contract for wages or salary accruing after discharge[56] or for advances on account thereof;[57] but the employee may recover on quantum meruit for services rendered after his discharge.[58]

Commissions and profits. Where the contract allows the employee commissions or a share of the profits, at least in the absence of grounds for an accounting in equity, a recovery thereon must be by an action at law.[59] It is not necessary that the employee should sue on a stated account or for an accounting, but he can bring his action for a specified amount due him.[60] It has been held, however, that after a contract has been terminated, so that nothing remains to be done except payment of money, an action on the common counts will lie for commissions or a share of the profits earned;[61] but, where plaintiff seeks commissions which he would have made under the contract had it not been breached, his action must be on the contract.[62]

Actions for accounting. Where a fiduciary relation exists between an employer and employee, an action by the latter for an accounting in equity will lie.[63] An employee whose compensation is based on commissions[64] or profits of the business[65] may, in most jurisdictions, bring an action in equity against his employer for an accounting, especially where he is employed by a partnership and a recovery of his share of the profits involves an accounting between the partners themselves;[66] and his right to an accounting is not suspended or defeated by the fact that he is about to become a competitor of his employer in the same kind of business.[67] In a few jurisdictions, however, it has been held that, in the absence of unusual circumstances, a bill in equity for an accounting will not lie[68] and that the proper remedy is an action at law.[69]

A suit in equity for an accounting will not lie where there is an adequate remedy at law,[70] but a suit for an injunction and an accounting will not be dismissed where the remedy at law is only partial and not complete.[71]

§ 123. Conditions Precedent

Where the contract clearly provides that the performance of specified acts shall be conditions precedent to a suit on the contract, the court, within certain limits, will enforce such provisions.

Where the contract clearly provides that the performance of specified acts shall be conditions precedent to a suit on the contract, the court, within certain limits, will enforce such provisions.[72] Thus a provision for service on the employer of a notice of the employee's claim will be enforced.[73] However, where the contract provides for the securing of a certificate of a third person, a recovery is permissible notwithstanding a failure to furnish a certificate where it is unreasonably withheld.[74] Where the contract provides for the return of papers by the employee as "a prerequisite to a final settlement" between the parties, the return of the papers is not a condition precedent to suit for damages, although it is to any recovery of wages under the contract.[75]

An employee who seeks to recover a money judgment for wages earned and past due to him, in accordance with a scale fixed by contract, has been held not to be required first to resort to administrative proceedings under the national or state labor relations acts.[76] It has been held that the failure of an employee to pursue the method of presenting grievances set up by the agreement between the employer and the employee's union precludes his recovery of wages due under such agreement.[77] However, it has also been held that a provision in a contract between an employer and a union providing for the arbitration of differences arising from the violation of the agreement does not make arbitration a condition precedent to an action for wages due under the contract,[78] particularly where the agreement does not contain a provision making an arbitration award a condition precedent to a right of action.[79] Certainly the submission of the controversy to arbitration is not a condition precedent to an action where the collective bargaining contract providing for such arbitration is void for want of authority of the union to make it.[80] Provisions in a union contract with an employer setting up machinery whereby employees may obtain the decision of the officials of the employing company on supposed grievances does not make resort to such machinery a condition precedent to an action for overtime under the contract.[81]

A demand for payment is not a condition precedent unless the contract specifically so provides.[82]

Financial ability of employee. Under a statute providing that the labor commissioner shall prosecute actions for wages of persons who are financially unable to employ counsel, it is not a condition precedent to the bringing of an action by the com-

Accounting

Where an action in equity by an employee against his employer for an accounting is otherwise proper as discussed supra § 122, it may be brought after the making of a proper demand.—Lester v. Hinkle, 141 N.E. 463, 193 Ind. 605—39 C.J. p 215 note 88.

Agreement to pay when able

A demand by employee for payment for overtime work was not a prerequisite to commencement of suit against corporate employer, where definite agreement existed to pay employee for overtime as soon as employer was financially able, and employer was able to pay for overtime.—Cole v. Findley Tool & Die Co., 287 N.W. 433, 290 Mich. 199.

missioner that lack of financial ability to employ counsel be first determined.[83]

Waiver. The performance of a condition precedent may be waived,[84] as where the employer answers on the merits without objecting to the nonperformance of the condition precedent.[85]

§ 124. Time to Sue and Limitations

An action for wages and other remuneration may be brought when such compensation is due and payable, and not before. It must be brought within the period fixed by a statute of limitations or by the contract.

A suit to recover wages and other remuneration may not be brought until such items are due and payable under the contract of employment;[86] and this is true where the employee quits before the end of the term[87] or is discharged for cause.[88]

When remuneration is due and payable, suit may be brought at once,[89] as in the case of wages payable periodically, at the end of any period,[90] although it is not necessary that it should be.[91] Similarly suit may be brought at once on the termination of a contract where it provides for the payment of wages from time to time as needed by the employee,[92] or where it is terminable at the option of either party and provides for payment when the services are completed,[93] or where the employee quits for cause.[94] Suit to recover a share of the profits, ascertainable under the terms of the contract only at the end of the year, may not be brought before that time.[95]

Effect of union agreement. On the theory, considered supra § 28 (41), that an individual member of a union is not bound by the terms of a contract between the union and the employer relating to the performance of work and the payment therefor unless he has assented thereto, it has been held, notwithstanding a union agreement relating to the time of payment of wages, that an individual member has the right to sue for his wages on the completion of his work, in the absence of any express contract with him.[96]

Limitation of actions. An action for wages must be brought within the period fixed by the statute of limitations expressly relating to such action,[97] or within a shorter time if the contract so stipulates.[98] The application of general statutes of limitations to actions on contracts of employment is considered in Limitations of Actions § 47, and the time of accrual of such actions in § 133 of that title.

Facts held not to constitute waiver

Requirement of employment contract with respect to filing of written notice of employee's claim for additional wages as a condition to recovery was not impliedly waived by employer by negotiations and efforts to arrive at a settlement, where employee was not lulled into nonaction by employer's statements, and, when employee's counsel negotiated with employer, there was no promise or suggestion of acquiescence on part of employer in employee's demands.—Dunlap v. West Const. Co., 162 P.2d 448, 23 Wash. 2d 827.

Action for accounting

An action by an employee for an accounting of profits is not premature where it is brought after completion of the work and, under the contract, the right to a division of profits accrued on such completion.—Cox v. Rippe, 19 N.W.2d 514, 146 Neb. 309.

Time of payment fixed by directors

An employee's cause of action against employer to recover sums representing a bonus and dividends on stock was prematurely brought, where employee had agreed to be bound by action of employer's board of directors and such board had provided for payment of bonus and dividends on date subsequent to that on which employee filed his complaint.—Berkowitz v. Provisions held inapplicable

(1) A statute imposing a limitation on actions by an employer to enforce a contract against his employee is not applicable to an action by the employee for wages.—Stone v. Bancroft, 70 P. 1017, 139 Cal. 78, affirmed on rehearing 72 P. 717, 139 Cal. 78.

Laches. An action for remuneration may also be barred by laches in a proper case.[99]

§ 125. Defenses

Matters germane to the cause of action for wages and presenting a legal reason why the plaintiff should not recover constitute a good defense to such action.

In general, matters which are germane to the cause of action for wages and which present a legal reason why plaintiff should not recover constitute a good defense to such action.[1] On the other hand, matters which are not germane to the cause of action pleaded[2] or which do not present a valid reason why plaintiff should not recover[3] are not valid defenses.

Accordingly it is not a defense that the employee's work was unskillfully done where he is seeking to recover the reasonable value of his services in quantum meruit[4] or where it is shown that the unskillful work was other than that contracted for and for which the employee seeks to recover wages;[5] that the employee had broken an agreement which formed the inducement for the employment, it appearing that the broken agreement was not the contract of employment and was entered into with some one other than the employer;[6] that the work in which the employee was engaged was being done for some one else other than the employer where it appears that, notwithstanding such fact, the employer had obligated himself by contract to pay for it;[7] that the members of the employer firm had agreed among themselves that one of their number should be responsible for payment of the employee's wages where it was shown that the employee was employed by the firm;[8] or that the services rendered to the employer were of an immoral nature and on an illegal consideration where it appears that, although the employee was not in fact married to the employer, the employer had fraudulently induced her to believe that she

Defense held not sustainable

A defense of laches is not sustainable where the suit for an accounting is brought within two months after expiration of the contractual period of service and, under the contract, a per cent of the profits was not to be paid to the employee until the expiration of such period.—Legum v. Campbell, 131 A. 147, 149 Md. 148.

Offer of compromise

Where discharged employee's suit was only for wages up to time of reinstatement, defendant's offer of compromise was valueless as a defense, since it referred exclusively to matters occurring subsequent to time of reinstatement.—Hoey v. New Orleans Great Northern R. Co., supra.

Recovery of judgment

An employee is not precluded from maintaining an action against his employer to recover notary fees to which he is entitled, and which he paid over to the employer under threat of discharge, by his recovery of damages for breach of the contract of employment.—Millsap v. National Funding Corporation, 152 P.2d 634, 66 Cal.App.2d 658.

3. La.—Rogers v. Estate of Peter Jung, App., 176 So. 886.

Particular matters held not valid defenses

(1) In employee's action against corporate employer for overtime work, employer could not rely on defense that employee and his superior had a secret agreement which was not binding on corporation, where superior was general manager who would be presumed to have authority to hire men and determine their rate of pay, and employee's timecards showing amount of overtime were not kept in secret places. —Cole v. Findley Tool & Die Co., 287 N.W. 433, 290 Mich. 199.

(2) Persons employing and assisting another to sell, and receiving proceeds of his sale of stock in corporation about to be organized by them cannot avoid their contractual obligation to pay him commission on ground that he was engaged in scheme to defraud customers by selling worthless securities of corporation without assets.—Sheridan v. Weber, 299 N.Y.S. 726, 252 App.Div. 398.

(3) In action for commissions allegedly due under employment contract, alleged fact that contracts on which commissions were based were subject to renegotiation to reduce the amount of excessive profits was not a defense.—Atkinson v. New Britain Mach. Co., C.C.A.Ill., 154 F. 2d 895.

(4) Other matters.—Huff v. Ford, D.C.Fla., 289 F. 858, reversed on other grounds, C.C.A., 296 F. 652, certiorari denied 45 S.Ct. 90, 266 U.S. 602, 69 L.Ed. 462.

Where work is worthless and without value because of the employee's lack of skill, he cannot recover.—Shasta Oil Co. v. Halliburton Oil Well Cementing Co., Tex.Civ.App., 10 S.W.2d 597, error refused.

6. N.Y.—Pollack v. Retail Tobacconist Printing & Publishing Co., Inc., 181 N.Y.S. 193.

7. Cal.—McFadden v. Crawford, 39 Cal. 662.

Manufacture of employee's invention by another

The officer of a large automobile manufacturing corporation which used an invention could neither add to nor subtract from liability under his contract with employee to pay royalties, and an equitable plea alleging that defendant did not individually manufacture either the mechanical device or the automobiles to which it was applied stated no equitable defense, defendant not being relieved of liability under his contract if such automobiles were manufactured by another for his benefit.—Huff v. Ford, D.C.Fla., 289 F. 858, reversed on other grounds, C.C.A., 296 F. 652, certiorari denied 45 S.Ct. 90, 266 U.S. 602, 69 L.Ed. 462.

8. Neb.—Brewer v. Wright, 41 N.W. 159, 25 Neb. 305.

was.[9] Where the employer continued to accept the employee's services, he cannot set up the employee's incompetency as a failure of performance which would bar recovery,[10] although, as discussed infra § 126, he may be entitled to a set-off or counterclaim for damages suffered thereby. Alleged illegality of a contract on the ground that it required performance on Sunday is not sustained by a written suggestion in the employer's letter to the employee that he could take a certain Sunday train to his work.[11]

The obtaining of employment under an assumed name is no defense where no injury to the employer resulted therefrom;[12] but the securing of employment by falsely personating in writing another is a defense where a statute has made such false personation a misdemeanor.[13] Where an employer has affirmed a fraudulently procured employment contract, the fraud will not constitute a bar to an employee's action for remuneration,[14] although, as considered infra § 126, he may set off or counterclaim for damages occasioned by such fraud.

Payment. Payment of the full amount due an employee is a valid defense to an action by the employee for remuneration.[15] While an offer to pay the full amount due and the employee's refusal thereof have been held to constitute a defense,[16] where the amount tendered is smaller than the amount due the employee's refusal thereof is not a defense;[17] and it has also been held that the employee's rejection of a tender of commission on the ground that it is smaller than the amount due will not preclude him from recovering the proper commission, even though the proper commission was no more than that tendered.[18] A refusal to deliver up an order on the employer for payment is no defense where it appears that the order had been presented for payment and payment had been refused.[19]

Payment by an employer to his own agent,[20] or to a third person without the employee's knowledge or consent,[21] is not a valid defense. However an agreement between the employer and the employee that wages shall be paid to a third person is a defense, if followed by payment;[22] otherwise it is not.[23]

Availability of set-off of claim in pending action. Under a statute so providing, it is a valid defense to an action by an employee for wages that an action by his master is pending in which he could set off his claim for wages.[24]

§ 126. —— Set-Off and Counterclaim

Rules relating to set-off and counterclaim generally apply to claims by an employer for damages in an action brought by the employee for his wages.

The rules of law relating to set-off and counterclaim generally apply to claims by an employer for damages in an action brought by the employee for his wages.[25] Thus an employer can set off or counterclaim for damages resulting from the employee's breach of the employment contract,[26] or from the negligence, incompetence, or wrongful acts of the employee resulting in loss to the employer,[27] even though such loss exceeds the amount of wages

Note for advances

Where traveling salesman's note for advances was to be void if sales were satisfactory, the fact that in various settlements during succeeding four years no claim was set up as to note was held to show that parties considered it void, so that the note could not be set off against the salesman's claim for remuneration.—Esterman-Verkamp Co. v. Dismissal

Employer's counterclaim in action for wages against ex-employee, based on fact that ex-employee was competing with employer, was properly dismissed, in view of failure to show any breach of contract by ex-employee or damage from ex-employee's acts.—Rosenstein v. Smith, 257 N.W. 397, 218 Iowa 1381.

earned;[28] and, while an employee's fraud in procuring the employment contract is not a defense to his action for remuneration where the employer has affirmed such contract, as discussed supra § 125, the employer may counterclaim for damages occasioned by such fraud.[29]

On the other hand, an employer may not plead as a set-off an unliquidated claim which is irrelevant to the suit,[30] or a claim for unliquidated damages occasioned by the employee's act,[31] or a claim based on the expectation that the employee would continue to work for the employer, where the employee had not so obligated himself.[32]

Since an employer may not recover back wages paid during a period of completed employment in the absence of a special agreement to that effect, as considered supra § 120, such a claim is not a valid counterclaim in an action by an employee for wages or other remuneration;[33] nor may an employer maintain a cross action for an overpayment to the employee which was voluntarily made.[34] It has been held that the employer cannot set off an account for goods sold by him to plaintiff.[35]

Where one is employed to do a specific job, rather than for specific hours, his employer is not entitled to a credit for the amount received by the employee from a third person for work done for such person by the employee in his spare time.[36]

§ 127. Parties

Rules relating to parties in actions on contracts generally apply to actions for compensation for services.

The rules relating to parties in actions on contracts generally, considered in Contracts §§ 518–522, have been held to apply to actions for compensation for services.[37]

§ 128. Pleading

a. In general
b. Issues, proof, and variance

a. In General

(1) Complaint
(2) Plea or answer
(3) Reply
(4) Amendment of pleadings

(1) Complaint

A complaint in an action by an employee to recover compensation for services must allege all the facts showing the existence of a cause of action.

Under the rules applicable to plaintiff's pleading in the case of civil actions generally, discussed in the C.J.S. title Pleading §§ 63–98, also 49 C.J. p 128 note 29–p 179 note 56, and more particularly in actions on contracts, considered in Contracts §§ 533–547, a complaint in an action to recover compensation for services must set forth clearly and with particularity[38] all the facts, as distinguished from

Actions for accounting

(1) In suit by employees against employer for commissions and bonuses, allegation that plaintiffs were unable to determine amount of commissions and bonuses because employer alone had such information and that accounting was sought to determine total commissions and bonuses due was sufficient to give chancery court jurisdiction.—Hamilton Depositors Corporation v. Browne, 136 S.W.2d 1031, 199 Ark. 953.

(2) Where a bill for discovery and accounting for per cent of net profits under a written contract of employment implied the accrual of profits, it was sufficiently explicit in that respect.—Legum v. Campbell, 131 A. 147, 149 Md. 148.

(3) An averment that written contract of employment was verbally renewed is equivalent to an allegation that it was continued on the same terms.—Legum v. Campbell, supra.

Claims for value of services

(1) Employee's petition in terms declaring for damages, but specifying measure of damages as value of services, amounted to claim on quantum meruit.—Westerfield v. Liberty Oil Co., 223 N.W. 894, 208 Iowa 912.

(2) Where plaintiff was employed at a stipulated salary to promote defendant's business for one year and defendant undertook to pay as further compensation such a per cent of profits derived from plaintiff's promotion of defendant's business in South America as might thereafter be agreed on by the parties, plaintiff's recovery of the reasonable value of the service performed in excess of the stipulated salary was required to proceed upon allegation of the reasonable value of the services, rather than for a per cent of the profits.—Bogy v. Meaning of word "due"

In action to recover salary, in which defense was that plaintiff agreed to deferment of payment, term "due" as employed in complaint and answer was held properly construed as meaning mere indebtedness without reference to time of payment and as synonymous with "owing" and as including debts payable in futuro.—Booth v. Booth & Bayliss Commercial School, 180 A. 278, 120 Conn. 221, 99 A.L.R. 1517.

(2) Statement of claim for compensation for services inferentially sets forth oral contract and sufficient cause of action.—Taylor v. Stanley

tween the parties,[47] although under a rule as to liberal construction of the pleadings it has been held that its terms need not be set forth directly.[48]

Nature of services. Where the action is brought on the contract, the complaint need not state the nature of the services in any greater particularity than stated in the contract.[49] Where, however, the employee is seeking to recover their reasonable value, allegations of the nature of the services rendered are proper.[50]

Performance. The complaint must allege performance of the contract on the part of the employee[51] or his readiness to perform.[52] The employee must either specially allege the facts constituting performance on his part[53] or, if he avails himself of the privilege of alleging performance in general terms in the form provided in the statute, he must follow that form.[54] It must appear from the pleading that the performance was in pursuance of the alleged agreement,[55] but performance need be alleged only to the extent required to justify the recovery sought.[56] If the services called for by the contract are severable, a failure to allege performance of a part will not defeat the employee's recovery for services sufficiently declared on.[57] Performance is sufficiently alleged where the complaint contains averments that plaintiff performed all the conditions of the contract as far as defendant permitted[58] or that he entered defendant's employ under a contract at a specified time and continued therein during a specified period.[59] Where such averments are made, it is not necessary, where the employee is discharged, for him further to allege that he used due diligence in seeking other employment and failed to obtain it.[60]

Demand for payment. While it has been held that a demand for payment need not be averred[61] except in special instances where a statute requires it,[62] it has also been held that the complaint must allege that demand for payment had been made or that defendant had failed or refused to pay the amount claimed by plaintiff.[63]

Prayer for relief. The rules governing the requisites of the prayer for relief in civil actions generally, considered in the C.J.S. title Pleading § 95, also 49 C.J. p 172 note 25–p 177 note 97, have been held to apply in actions to recover compensation for services rendered by an employee.[64] In an action at law

64. Prayer held to justify award of interest

In action for compensation due under oral employment contract, prayer for specified sum, for interest as provided by statute, and for further relief to which plaintiff may show himself justly entitled, constituted sufficient basis for award of involving compensation based on the employer's profits it has been held proper to ask for a judgment that an account be taken and that the employer pay the employee the amount found due him.[65]

(2) Plea or Answer

In order to be sufficient, the defendant's plea or answer must state facts establishing a defense.

Under the rules governing pleas or answers in civil actions generally, considered in the C.J.S. title Pleading §§ 99–183, also 49 C.J. p 179 note 57–p 309 note 13, and more particularly in actions on contracts, considered in Contracts §§ 548–560, in order to be sufficient, defendant's plea or answer must state facts and circumstances establishing a defense.[66] An answer is sufficient where it specifically denies the agreement alleged in the complaint,[67] or alleges a modification of the original contract agreed to by the parties and the employer's performance of the modified agreement,[68] or the discharge of the employee, stating the grounds therefor.[69] It is not sufficient merely to set up a discharge for unsatisfactory work without alleging any specific default[70] or, in the absence of a denial, merely to set up a version of the transaction inconsistent with that set up in the complaint.[71] Matters alleged in the complaint which are not denied by the answer are admitted.[72] Counts of the answer setting forth immaterial matter will be stricken.[73]

Set-off, settlement, and special defenses. If a set-off,[74] or settlement,[75] or a special, affirmative, or statutory defense[76] is relied on it must be specially pleaded.

(3) Reply

Rules governing the necessity and sufficiency of replications and replies in civil actions generally apply in actions to recover compensation for services.

In accordance with the rules governing the pleading of replications and replies in civil actions generally, considered in the C.J.S. title Pleading §§ 184–206, also 49 C.J. p 322 note 87–p 358 note 43, the necessity for a replication in an action to recover compensation for services is governed by the answer, and no reply is necessary where an issue has theretofore been formed.[77] A reply must not

Inconsistency

In accountant's action for reasonable value of services rendered for defendant in a lawsuit, where answer was a general denial and plea that accountant was employed by defendant's attorney who was paid for all services including accountants, pleading would not support defendant's contention of a binding agreement between accountant and defendant fixing amount of accountant's compensation.—Twichell v. Matter raised in pretrial order

In employee's action for services rendered to defendant railroad company, where issue of overpayments of wages to plaintiff was expressly raised in pretrial order, defendant's right to set off such overpayments against plaintiff's recovery was not foreclosed by defendant's failure to plead such overpayments.—Rogers v. contain material allegations inconsistent with the allegations of the complaint.[78]

(4) Amendment of Pleadings

The rules governing amendment of pleadings generally apply in actions to recover compensation for services.

The rules governing the amendment of pleadings in civil actions generally, discussed in the C.J.S. title Pleading §§ 275–322, also 49 C.J. p 465 note 82–p 562 note 3, have been held to apply in actions to recover compensation for services rendered.[79]

b. Issues, Proof, and Variance

In accordance with general rules, the issues are determined by the pleadings and the proof must correspond with the allegations in the pleadings.

In accordance with the rules applicable in civil actions generally, and more particularly in actions on contracts, considered in Contracts §§ 565–577, the issues, in actions to recover compensation for services, are determined by the pleadings[80] and the proof must correspond with the allegations in the pleadings;[81] but an immaterial variance which does not mislead or surprise either party has been held not to be fatal.[82] Every fact necessary to constitute a cause of action or defense must be proved;[83] and evidence not within the issues is properly excluded.[84]

Accordingly, if the complaint is for the recovery of wages, under a special contract, damages for breach of the contract cannot be proved;[85] if an express contract is alleged, evidence is not admissible to show an implied contract;[86] if a particular contract is alleged, plaintiff cannot prove a subsequent arrangement which is not alleged;[87] if a full performance of the contract is averred, evidence of an excuse for nonperformance is inadmissible;[88] and allegations of a contract between the employee and the employer will not permit the substitution therefor in the evidence of a contract between the employer and third persons obligating the employer to pay the employee.[89]

Evidence admissible under general issue. A contract of employment different from the one alleged by the employee in his action to recover compensation for his services,[90] or any terms of the alleged contract, which would operate to bar his recovery,[91] may be shown under the general issue or denial, as may also any evidence that the employee has breached or failed to perform his part of the contract,[92] although, on nonperformance, there is also some authority to the contrary.[93] It has been held that, under the general issue, evidence is admissible to show a good cause for discharge,[94] or employment by a third person during the time for which the employee sues to recover wages,[95] or fraud in the execution of the contract,[96] or payment in full or in part.[97] However, it has also been held that defendant cannot rely on a defense of payment[98] or counterclaim[99] under a general denial. Evidence of modification or cancellation of the contract of employment has been held not to be admissible under the general issue or denial.[1]

In an action by an employee to recover the excess of disbursements over receipts in conducting the employer's business, evidence tending to show that the receipts or expenditures alleged by plaintiff are not correct, and hence tending to show that defendant is not indebted to plaintiff at all or in the amount claimed, is admissible under the general issue.[2]

Evidence of contract price or value of services. In an action on an express contract for a fixed salary, evidence of the reasonable value of the services is inadmissible,[3] even where the wages accrued after the expiration of the contract and under an implied renewal of its terms,[4] except for the purpose of showing the probabilities with reference to the respective versions of the parties as to the amount of compensation agreed on where they are in conflict,[5] or for the purpose of meeting and refuting some other claim of the employer,[6] or of furnishing ground for recovery in quantum meruit in case the terms or validity of the contract, where in issue, is not established.[7] However, where plaintiff alleges both an agreed price for services and their reasonable value, evidence as to both is properly received.[8]

Where the wages are incapable of estimation in the way provided for by the contract[9] or where the work is done without any agreement between the parties as to the compensation[10] evidence of the reasonable value of the services is admissible. So, where it is alleged that the employer agreed to pay what he could afford to pay for managing the business, evidence of the value of the services, considering their nature and the profits of the business, is admissible.[11] Where the action is brought on quantum meruit, the contract is admissible in evidence as tending to show the value of the services.[12]

12. Or.—Toy v. Gong, 170 P. 936, 87 Or. 454.

13. Compensation for use of automobile
In absence of express agreement to contrary, presumption exists that use of servant's automobile during employment demonstrating master's product was given gratuitously, especially in view of servant's conduct.—Hett v. Barty Axle Corporation, 241 N.Y.S. 609, 229 App.Div. 388.

Nature of bonus plan
Where bonus plan was set forth in store operations manual and employing agent discussed matter of bonus with employee at time of hiring, in absence of other evidence example, that a contract of employment is to be performed in the state where it is executed;[14] that the performance of the services is a condition precedent to payment;[15] that the employment was for certain fixed periods where it is shown that payments of wages were made regularly at the end of such periods[16] that the services were rendered under the contract of employment;[17] and that they continued to the end of the term contracted for[18] or until the death of the employee in the service, where it is shown that the relation of employer and employee existed.[19]

Unusual contracts. Employment contracts, unusual in their terms, are not presumed,[20] such as an agreement to work a year for a certain sum per day with payment at the end of the term,[21] or an agreement by a popular singer, much in demand, binding herself for a considerable period to sing exclusively for one employer at a fixed weekly salary to be paid only for such weeks as she should be booked.[22]

Rate or amount of compensation. All services rendered subsequent to the making of a contract of employment are presumed to be rendered at the contract price where it is shown that the contract defined the employee's compensation and that there is no subsequent agreement for an increase[23] or reduction;[24] and this presumption is not rebutted by a change of the place of employment[25] and the assumption of additional duties.[26] The rule is otherwise where a subsequent agreement for an increase or reduction is proved[27] or is itself to be presumed from periodic payments of a greater or smaller amount and their acceptance by the employee.[28]

Extra compensation for extra services. When extra work performed is of a character different from that contemplated by the original contract of employment, its performance by the employee and acceptance by the employer will raise an implication that extra compensation was intended therefor;[29] but services rendered by the employee during his employment which are similar in character to his regular duties are presumed to be compensated for by the stipulated wage or salary.[30] This is true even though the services are not technically in the line of his duty, where it is shown that they were performed by the employee at the request of his employer.[31]

b. Burden of Proof

(1) In general
(2) Defenses; set-off and counterclaim

(1) In General

In actions by an employee to recover compensation for his services, the plaintiff has the burden of proving every fact essential to his cause of action.

In accordance with the rules governing the burden of proof in civil actions generally, plaintiff, in an action by an employee to recover compensation for his services, has the burden of proving every court was required to assume that bonus referred to was bonus plan as set forth in such manual.—Montgomery Ward & Co. v. Guignet, 45 N.E.2d 337, 112 Ind.App. 661.

Surrender of right of deduction for lost time

With respect to whether an employer may deduct from employee's wages pro rata amount during period when service is interrupted by act of government or by illness or by circumstances not the fault of either party, a surrender by employer of right to deduct wages for short periods of lost time is to be readily inferred.—Clark v. Nature and extent of services

It could be presumed that man of wide business experience would not enter into contract not expressing services he intended to perform; and if he intended his services to be merely nominal, while he received a large salary, he should have made such an unusual situation clear in the contract.—Arkansas Amusement Corporation v. fact essential to his cause of action.[32] Thus the burden is on the employee who sues to recover compensation for his services to establish the contract on which his right to recover depends and the terms thereof,[33] except in so far as the rule may be affected by statute;[34] its fairness and propriety where made under circumstances requiring such proof;[35] the performance of his own obligations[36] or excuse for nonperformance;[37] the happening of any contingency on which his right to recover is based;[38] the liability of defendant under the contract;[39] the employee's diligence in its enforcement, where required by circumstances;[40] the waiver by the employer of causes for rescinding the contract;[41] the employer's mistake where the employee seeks to recover more compensation than the employer had allowed him in an earlier settlement;[42] and, where necessary, accounts between the parties sufficiently accurate and clear to warrant the employee's recovery.[43]

In an action by the employer to recover an amount overdrawn by the employee, plaintiff has the burden of proving the allegations of his petition.[44] It is the duty of defendant employee to overcome a prima facie case made out by plaintiff employer in an action on open account and account stated.[45]

Foreign laws. While the employee has the burden of proving the laws of a foreign state which it was agreed should govern the interpretation of the employment contract,[46] the failure to prove such foreign law is not fatal where there is no reason to suppose that any statute law of the foreign state might govern the questions arising in the case.[47]

Right to recover reasonable value. Where plaintiff seeks to recover for the reasonable value of his services, he has the burden of proving that he was induced to perform such services for defendant[48] and that there was no agreement fixing the amount of compensation.[49]

Holding over. Where an employee holds over after the term, the burden is on him to prove that he performed the services under an express or implied contract that he was to receive the original rate of compensation;[50] but, if the employee continues to render the same services, the presumption that the services were continued under the original contract, considered supra § 118, will shift the burden of proving the contrary to the employer.[51]

Lost time. Where the employee seeks to recover for lost time, the burden is on him to prove an express or implied contract obligating the employer to pay for lost time.[52]

Additional compensation for extra services. Where an employee seeks to recover from his employer compensation for extra work performed during a period covered by the contract of employment, the burden is on him to prove that the services for which additional compensation is sought are outside the scope of the employee's general employment as contemplated by the parties to the contract,[53] and that the employer either expressly or impliedly promised to pay additional compensation for such extra services.[54] Where the nature of the services is such as to raise the implication that they are compensated for by the stipulated wage, the employee has the burden of proving an express contract for extra compensation for such services.[55]

Exercise of employer's discretion. Where the employee's right to a recovery is dependent, wholly or in part, on the employer's exercise of his discretion, the authorities are in conflict, some holding that the burden is on the employee to prove that the employer's act or failure to act in the exercise of that power was in bad faith,[56] others holding that the burden is on the employer to establish his own good faith.[57]

Minimum and maximum compensation. Where the contract fixes the compensation to be paid between minimum and maximum limits, the exact amount to be determined by certain considerations stated, the burden is on the employee to establish by proof of the existence of such circumstances his right to any compensation in excess of the minimum amount stated.[58]

Damages. If the employee seeks to recover damages for the breach of the contract of employment, the burden is on him to prove the damages which he actually suffered,[59] even where the employer admits all the facts alleged by the employee in his complaint.[60] Where the action is for reimbursement for moneys advanced by the employee in the employer's business, the burden of proving the advances made is on the employee.[61]

Burden of evidence. The burden of evidence, meaning thereby the burden of going forward with the evidence to establish or to meet a prima facie case, is, in the first instance, on the employee to show the contract of employment, his own performance, or readiness to perform and the employer's breach.[62] The burden is then shifted to the employer to establish his defense.[63]

(2) Defenses; Set-Off and Counterclaim

The burden is on the employer to prove affirmative matters of defense.

The burden is on the employer to prove affirmative matters of defense,[64] as, for example, that the services were rendered gratuitously;[65] that the contract of employment is other than the contract set up by the employee,[66] or was superseded[67] or modified[68] by a subsequent agreement; that it is illegal[69] or invalid or voidable;[70] that it has been rescinded;[71] that there was a settlement of employee's claim;[72] or that another employer has been substituted relieving defendant from further liability,[73] in which case the burden is on defendant to prove the performance of all conditions precedent required by the contract before such a substitution could be effectually made.[74]

Conduct and competence of employee. The employer has the burden of proving that the employee has been unfaithful;[75] that he was guilty of a breach of an implied covenant of skill;[76] that he has misappropriated funds belonging to the employer equal to, or in excess of, the amount alleged to be due him;[77] that the employer suffered loss by the employee's carelessness;[78] that the employee has been rightfully discharged, the employer in such case having the burden to establish a sufficient ground for the discharge[79] and that he has forfeited the wages due him.[80]

Expenditures in net profits cases. In cases involving an employee's claim to a share of the net profits of his employer's business, the burden is on the employer to prove all expenditures entering into the computation.[81]

Payment. While it has been held that the employee must prove the employer's nonperformance of the contract by failure to make payment in accordance therewith,[82] it is more frequently held that payment is a matter of defense and that the burden of proving such defense is on the employer.[83] However, where the facts raise a presumption that the employee has been paid, as considered supra § 121, the employee has the burden of overcoming the presumption of payment.[84]

Set-off and counterclaim. The burden is on the employer to prove his loss where he seeks to recoup damages by reason of the employee's quitting before the end of the term[85] or illegally withholding funds belonging to him.[86] The burden is also on the employer to prove the extent of overpayments made by him where he counterclaims therefor.[87] Where the employer sets up a counterclaim for moneys lost by the employee, and the employee admits the loss but alleges that it was not through his negligence, the burden of showing the absence of negligence is on the employee.[88]

An employee who interposes a counterclaim in an action by the employer to recover money overdrawn has the burden of proving the contract relied on by him for the purpose of establishing the counterclaim.[89]

c. Admissibility

(1) In general
(2) Compensation
(3) Performance
(4) Amount due and payment

(1) In General

The rules governing the admissibility of evidence in civil cases generally have been held to apply in actions by an employee to recover remuneration for his services.

The rules as to competency, relevancy, and materiality applicable in the case of civil actions generally have been held to apply in determining the admissibility of evidence in actions by an employee to recover remuneration for his services,[90] as in determining the admissibility of evidence to show who was the real employer[91] and to show the existence and terms of the contract of employment.[92]

(2) Compensation

The admissibility of evidence to show the amount of compensation due has been adjudicated.

In accordance with the general rules of evidence, the admissibility of evidence has been adjudicated with respect to evidence to show the agreed amount of compensation,[93] and its increase[94] or reduction,[95] or, in the case in which evidence of reasonable value is admissible under the pleadings, considered supra § 128 b, the reasonable value of the services rendered.[96]

In order to show the agreed amount of compensation, earlier contracts between the parties may be admitted,[97] as may be evidence of the services[98]

or payments[99] made thereunder, provided the connection is shown;[1] and the employment agreement of a fellow employee with the same employer has also been held to be admissible.[2] What other employers had paid plaintiff for his services[3] or customarily paid to other employees under similar contracts,[4] is not admissible except where it is shown that plaintiff left another's service to enter defendant's employ.[5] Where the employer alleges the employment contract to be unreasonable, evidence of salaries paid to former employees is admissible as bearing on the reasonableness of the alleged contract.[6]

Overtime. Rules governing the admissibility of evidence generally have been held to apply in actions for overtime compensation.[7] On the question of existence of a contract to pay for overtime, the employer may show the receipt of checks in full payment for services rendered,[8] or that the employee voluntarily continued work, although overtime duties were regularly required without extra pay, and received his monthly salaries regularly without coming to a definite understanding with him with regard to additional remuneration.[9] The employee may show that the employer's agent, although unauthorized to do so, told him that he would receive compensation for overtime;[10] and a letter from the general manager of the employer to the employee is admissible.[11]

Bonus. Where the employee claims that he is entitled to a bonus, evidence is admissible tending to show that a bonus was promised by the employer.[12]

Commissions. The admissibility of evidence offered to show the amount of sales on which commissions are based[13] or to explain items of the account between the employer and the employee[14] has been adjudicated. For this purpose sales in periods other than the one in question may be considered if they are not too remote and if evidence of them is the best evidence procurable under the circumstances;[15] but evidence of the employee's earnings under the same contract in prior years is not admissible.[16]

Profits. Under the general rules of evidence, evidence may be admitted to show the existence and the terms of a contract to compensate the employee with a share of the profits[17] and to show the earnings and profits of the employer.[18]

Expenses. The admissibility of evidence to prove the employer's breach of a contract to pay the employee's traveling expenses and the amount of such expenses has been adjudicated.[19] Directions to the employee not to spend any money without the employer's orders are admissible where the contract is in writing and does not provide that the employer shall pay the employee's expenses.[20] Evidence that the employee was not diligent and neglected his duty so as not to be entitled to a fixed sum which the employer had agreed to pay him periodically for his traveling expenses on the basis of his continuous service is admissible,[21] even though the employee was hired on a commission basis and would himself be the chief sufferer from his own lack of diligence and neglect.[22]

(3) Performance

Any evidence otherwise competent and relevant is admissible to establish performance, abandonment, or breach of the contract by the servant.

Under the rules applicable to civil actions generally, any evidence which is otherwise competent and relevant may be admitted to establish the fact of performance of the contract[23] or to show the fact of abandonment[24] or breach[25] of the contract by the servant. Facts indicating that plaintiff did not fully perform his contract are admissible regardless of whether the action is brought on a special contract or in quantum meruit, such facts, if proved, barring a recovery on the contract, and having a bearing on the value of such services as he did perform where a recovery in quantum meruit is allowed.[26]

Happening of contingency. Where performance under the contract involves the happening of a contingency named therein as a condition precedent to recovery, evidence bearing on the happening of such contingency is admissible.[27]

(4) Amount Due and Payment

The general rules governing the admissibility of evidence apply to evidence to show the amount due to an employee or the payment thereof.

The general rules governing the admissibility of evidence in civil actions have been applied to evidence offered to show the amount due to an employee under his contract.[28] Accordingly the acts and declarations of an employer recognizing the continued liability to the employee for his services after he has left his employment are admissible to show the employer's waiver of the forfeiture of the employee's wages.[29] Evidence of extra expenses alleged by the employer to have been incurred by him because of his employee's sickness is not admissible as forming the basis of deductions from the employee's salary in the absence of any evidence substantiating the charge that the expenses were incurred for that reason.[30] Evidence of the amount an employee actually received monthly from outside work is immaterial where, in carrying to the account of his employer the amount received from others, the employee credited his employer with the entire amount due from him for those months.[31] Evidence of work done for others by an employee after his discharge is not admissible in the absence of a special plea by the employer setting up such earnings as a defense to the action.[32]

Payment. Subject to the rules of evidence as to competency, relevancy, and materiality, evidence is admissible to show payment[33] or nonpayment.[34] In order to establish payment of the employee's wages, in whole or in part, an employer may show that the employee had been paying his living expenses during the period in issue and that he had not been withdrawing money from the bank for that purpose;[35] that he had received full time payments for days when he had not given a full day's service to reduce the employee's claims for overtime payments on other days;[36] and that the services rendered were domestic services within the meaning of the rule raising the presumption of payment in such cases.[37] However, he cannot show for this purpose his employee's methods of doing his work,[38] or his representations respecting his ability[39] or the work[40] of other employees. On the other hand, the employee may show that the employer stated to him after he had completed his service that he would pay him a specified sum, as tending to show that the services had not at that time been fully paid for.[41] In proving payment, the employee's bookkeeping methods may be in issue and to show that he kept his personal account separate from the labor-expense account, checks received by the employee, some payable to him personally and some on account of his employer's business, are admissible.[42]

d. Weight and Sufficiency

In an action by an employee to recover compensation, the party having the affirmative of an issue must prove it by a preponderance of the evidence.

In an action with respect to the compensation of an employee, the party having the affirmative of an issue must prove it by a preponderance of the evidence.[43] In particular cases the courts have adjudicated the sufficiency or insufficiency of the evi-

§ 130. Trial in General

The rules governing the determination of questions of law and fact in an action for wages are discussed infra § 131, those relating to instructions to the jury infra § 132, and those dealing with verdict and findings infra § 133.

§ 131. Questions of Law and Fact

a. In general
b. Contract of employment
c. Compensation and amount of recovery
d. Waiver or estoppel

a. In General

If an action to recover wages or other compensation is tried before a jury, questions of fact are for the exclusive consideration of the jury.

In an action, tried before a jury, to recover wages or other compensation, questions of fact are for the exclusive consideration of the jury.[86] Where the entire case rests on parol testimony, the credibility of the witnesses is for the jury and binding instructions to find for one party are not proper;[87] and the case is especially one for the jury where the evidence of plaintiff, if believed, is fully adequate to maintain his contentions, and the evidence of defendant, if believed, is sufficient to defeat them.[88] The court may properly refuse to direct a verdict for defendant where there is contradictory evidence on the material issues[89] or where there is sufficient evidence to sustain a verdict in favor of plaintiff;[90] and the direction of a verdict for defendant on the whole case may and should be refused where it is asked on a ground which relates only to a possible curtailment of damages[91] or where plaintiff's testimony establishes a prima facie case as to part of his claim;[92] but, where there is no substantial evidence on which plaintiff may recover, it is the duty of the court to direct a verdict for defendant.[93] So too, where the evidence makes out a prima facie case for the employer in his action to recover back salary paid the employee, it is error to direct a verdict for defendant.[94]

Where an action, brought by the employer to recover money overdrawn and in which the employee interposes a counterclaim and seeks an accounting, is transferred to equity, and the employer moves to dismiss at the close of the employee's evidence, but the court, instead of ruling on the motion at that time, directs plaintiff to proceed with his evidence, it is proper for the court, when subsequently ruling on the motion, to consider all the evidence offered by plaintiff.[95]

b. Contract of Employment

(1) In general
(2) Renewal, termination, or modification
(3) Performance or nonperformance by plaintiff

(1) In General

Controverted questions of fact as to the existence and terms of a contract of employment between plaintiff and defendant are to be determined by the jury; but if there is an entire absence of evidence of such a contract the court should so hold as a matter of law and dispose of the case by granting a nonsuit or directing a verdict for defendant. The construction of an undisputed and unambiguous contract of employment is a question of law for the court.

Controverted questions of fact as to the existence of the contract of employment,[96] the terms of such contract[97] and the scope of the employment thereunder,[98] the authority of an agent to bind the employer,[99] the identity of the employer,[1] and whether the contract was obtained by fraudulent representations on plaintiff's part[2] are for the jury. So too, where the trial is before the court without a jury, the question whether plaintiff was an employee of, or was engaged in a joint venture with,

Evidence sufficient for submission or finding
(1) Where, on conflicting evidence, it could have been found that there was or was not a special contract of employment and that, if there was not, plaintiff in any event rendered services to defendant for which he was entitled to be paid, denial of defendant's request for a ruling that there was no evidence on which jury was warranted in finding for plaintiff on either count on contract or count on account annexed was not error.—Donahue v. Dal, Inc., 50 N.E.2d 207, 314 Mass. 460.

Legality of resolution conferring authority
It may, under the issues, be a question of fact whether or not the adoption of a resolution of a board of directors authorizing the manager to hire employees and fix salaries was procured as part of a fraudulent and collusive scheme between the manager and plaintiff; and, in such case, the court may not assume as a matter of law that the resolution is free from any taint of fraud or collusion and that the acts of the manager thereunder are binding on the corporation.—Schulte v. Ideal Food Products Co., 226 N.W. 174, 208 Iowa 767.

2. N.C.—Falls v. Moore, 188 S.E. 614, 210 N.C. 839.

defendant may be one of fact for the trial court.[3] On the other hand, if there is an entire absence of evidence of any agreement, the court should so hold as a matter of law.[4] Construction of the contract of employment is a question of law for the court, and not a question for the jury,[5] where the contract is unambiguous;[6] but conflicting claims as to the construction of the contract which cannot be determined from the face of the contract present a question of fact to be determined by the jury.[7]

Whether the proof adduced to establish the contract measures up to the required standard is primarily a question for the court on a motion for nonsuit;[8] and a nonsuit may and should be granted, or a verdict for defendant directed, where the evidence does not show the rendition of any services by plaintiff for defendant, or any agreement whereby defendant employed plaintiff,[9] or undisputed evidence shows an agreement different from that alleged and full settlement and satisfaction;[10] but a motion for nonsuit may properly be denied where the testimony clearly presents a question of fact as to the employment of plaintiff by defendant;[11] and defendant's motions for an involuntary nonsuit and a directed verdict in his favor are properly denied where there is evidence from which the jury might find or infer that the person who entered into the contract on behalf of defendant had authority to do so[12] or that defendant ratified the employment.[13]

Duration and term of employment. Questions of fact on conflicting evidence as to the duration of the employment,[14] as, for example, what is a reasonable time when it is alleged that the hiring is for a reasonable time,[15] and as to the length of the employment term, whether by the month or year,[16] or by the day or month,[17] or the day or week,[18] are for the jury.

(2) Renewal, Termination, or Modification

In so far as they involve controverted issues of fact, questions connected with the renewal, continuance, termination, or modification of a contract of employment are to be determined by the jury.

It is for the jury to determine controverted issues of fact connected with the renewal,[19] continuance,[20] or termination[21] of an employment contract, or its termination and the making of a new agreement.[22] So also questions relating to changes in the scope of plaintiff's employment or other modification of the contract of employment, as far as decisions on controverted issues of fact are involved, are for the determination of the jury,[23] as, for example, whether a subsequent increase in the responsibilities and work of plaintiff, hired under a contract, ambiguous in its terms, was contemplated in such original hiring as being within its scope and fully compensated thereby,[24] or whether a proposed reduction of wages or commissions has been consented to by plaintiff;[25] but in a particular case the evidence in respect of an alleged modification may be insufficient for submission to the jury.[26]

(3) Performance or Nonperformance by Plaintiff

Except where the facts are not in dispute, questions as to plaintiff's performance or nonperformance of the contract, and excuses for his nonperformance, are to be determined by the jury.

On conflicting evidence, questions arising as to the performance of the contract by plaintiff are for the jury,[27] as are questions as to the existence of excuses for nonperformance,[28] his negligence and damages resulting therefrom,[29] his misconduct,[30] his absences from his work,[31] and as to the happening of any contingency on which the employee's right to compensation is made to depend.[32]

Where the facts as to plaintiff's performance or nonperformance of his contract are not in dispute, it is for the court to decide as a question of law whether such facts constitute a breach by plaintiff of his contract barring recovery.[33]

Abandonment of, or discharge from, employment. Controverted questions of fact relating to plaintiff's abandonment of his work[34] or to his discharge[35] are within the province of the jury to determine, as, for example, whether plaintiff was discharged[36] or left of his own accord,[37] and, if he abandoned the employment, whether he did so with[38] or without[39] legal justification, or, if he was discharged, the reason for the discharge[40] and whether or not the discharge was for adequate cause.[41]

c. Compensation and Amount of Recovery

(1) In general
(2) Amount due and payment

(1) In General

Questions of fact relating to a bonus, a share of the profits, commissions or other compensation matter are to be determined by the jury where the action is tried before a jury and the evidence on such questions is conflicting.

It is within the province of the jury to determine all questions of fact, on conflicting testimony, in respect of the employee's rights to compensation,[42]

Dismissal or nonsuit
(1) A nonsuit was properly granted where the evidence did not make case for jury in plaintiff's action for compensation for extra time.—Chambers v. W. L. Florence Const. Co., 36 S.E.2d 69, 73 Ga.App. 172.

(2) Employee's reconventional demand for eventual profits in accordance with contract was properly dis-

not be submitted to the jury where the compensation provision of the contract is clear and an affirmative finding would do violence to its plain and unambiguous language.[58]

Where the case is tried without a jury, it is a question of fact for the court whether plaintiff was employed to perform, and is entitled to compensation for, certain services in addition to his regular services,[59] or, in a brokerage manager's action for commissions, what sales were made through the brokerage department,[60] or questions pertaining to profits, in an action involving the employee's right, under an oral agreement, to a share of the net profits.[61]

(2) Amount Due and Payment

On conflicting evidence, questions as to the amount due plaintiff and whether or not his claim has been paid are for the jury.

The question of the amount due plaintiff, when depending on facts as to which the evidence is conflicting, is for the jury;[62] but it is proper to refuse to submit issues raised by a plea in reconvention for damages where the evidence furnishes no basis for measuring and computing such damages;[63] and it is proper to direct a verdict for plaintiff where the amount due him is stipulated and the employer concedes that the employee's breach of contract is so minor in character that no money damages accrue therefrom.[64]

Controverted issues of fact, involved in defendant's alleged payment of plaintiff's claim, are for the jury,[65] as, for example, whether there has been a payment in full,[66] or whether plaintiff signed the pay roll[67] or a receipt in full with knowledge and intent that it should operate as a release of all claims by him against his employer.[68]

Attorney's fees. The determination of the amount of attorney's fees to be allowed a successful plaintiff under the statutes authorizing it is for the court;[69] but before such fees may be allowed it is necessary that the jury should find that the statutory conditions precedent to such allowance have all been performed by plaintiff.[70]

d. Waiver or Estoppel

An issue of fact presented by the evidence in respect of waiver or estoppel on the part of the employer or employee is to be determined by the jury.

To the extent of the questions of fact involved, it is for the jury to determine whether an employer by his conduct has waived his right to object to his employee's work,[71] as, for example, by acquiescing in the manner of performance[72] or by accepting the employee's services.[73] Also the evidence in the case may be such as to present an issue of fact for the jury as to whether the employer has, by his conduct and promises, lulled the employee into a sense of security and led him to believe that he would be paid, so as to estop the employer to assert a plea of laches and stale demand.[74]

Waiver by employee. It is for the jury to determine whether an employee waived, or estopped himself to assert, his claim to a right to more wages under his contract than he is receiving by the acceptance of a smaller amount,[75] or by the acceptance of a larger amount than the contract calls missed as of nonsuit, in view of failure to show profits with any degree of certainty.—Day Bros., Gilham & Winton v. Marsan, 131 So. 665, 171 La. 545.

§ 132. Instructions

The instructions to the jury should state the law accurately without being misleading or going beyond the issues.

In an action, tried before a jury, for wages or other compensation, the court should give instructions which clearly and accurately state the law applicable to the issues[77] and the theories or contentions of the parties,[78] provided such theories or contentions find support in the evidence.[79] The instructions given must conform to, and not go beyond, the issues[80] presented by the pleadings[81] and the evidence;[82] and they must not be confusing,[83]

inconsistent,[84] or misleading.[85] However, an instruction is not vitiated by a slight verbal or technical inaccuracy, not calculated to mislead the jury, such as a statement that plaintiff would "forfeit" his commissions if the jury found certain facts, the contract not containing any forfeiture clause;[86] and, in view of other facts considered with a conceded fact, an instruction which treats the conceded fact as a disputed fact may not be fatally objectionable.[87] While the instructions must not invade the province of the jury,[88] it is error to submit to the jury the issue of the reasonable value of services without informing the jurors what they should take into consideration in determining what is reasonable compensation.[89]

The instructions should not assume the existence of a contract where it is in dispute;[90] but where the existence and authenticity of certain writings of the parties are not in dispute, it is the duty of the court to instruct that they do not constitute a contract of employment if such is the fact;[91] and, where the court has erred in admitting parol proof to vary the terms of a written contract, it necessarily errs in submitting to the jury the question whether the written contract was changed by such proof.[92] Where the employment contract is construed by the court to be an indefinite hiring terminable at will, the court should, on request, charge as to what would constitute a termination.[93] In case the facts are undisputed and amount to a legal justification for the discharge of the servant, the court should so charge the jury.[94]

Burden and degree of proof. The instructions should require plaintiff to establish his case by a preponderance of the evidence;[95] but it is proper to refuse a requested instruction placing on plaintiff the burden of proving that he did not do certain acts claimed to bar recovery;[96] and it is also proper to give a correct and pertinent instruction regarding the burden of proof resting on defendant in respect of affirmative matters asserted by him.[97]

§ 133. Verdict and Findings

Findings must be consistent with each other. When made by the court they must cover the material issues and support the conclusions of law.

In an action by an employee to recover compensation, the findings must be consistent with each other,[98] and, where they are by the court, they must be sufficient to support the conclusions of law.[99] A special finding does not control a general verdict, if it is consistent therewith, as where there is a special finding that commissions were not allowed by the contract for certain sales, and a general verdict allowing recovery of commissions on other sales,[1] or a special finding that there was no contract for compensating plaintiff in certain ways, and a general verdict for the value of his services.[2] In a case tried by the court without a jury, there must be a finding on a material issue of whether or not plaintiff complied with his contract to devote his entire time to defendant's business;[3] and, where the court finds that plaintiff is entitled to recover a specified lump sum for salary and expenses, it is error to refuse a written request to find additional facts showing what part of the sum was awarded for salary and what part for expenses.[4] Requested findings which are improper may be rejected.[5]

A referee commits error when he disallows plaintiff's claim for a year's conceded services due to a misconception as to the proper construction to be given to inconsistent allegations in the complaint;[6] and in an action for an accounting, brought by an employee entitled to be compensated for his services by a certain per cent of the net income of defendant's business, it is error for the auditor to base a finding on evidence improperly admitted.[7]

§ 134. Judgment

The judgment must conform to, and be supported by, the pleadings, evidence, and findings.

The judgment entered in an action for wages or other compensation must be in conformity with the law[8] and be supported by the pleadings,[9] evidence,[10] and findings.[11] A complaint for wages does not warrant a judgment for damages for breach of contract[12] or on a quantum meruit,[13] especially where the judgment is by default.[14] Where, however, it is admitted, in a suit on an employment contract, that a contract was made, but the amount of compensation is in dispute and the jury find that the parties never came to an agreement on this point, a judgment for the reasonable value of the services may be allowed;[15] and it has been held that, although an action is brought for the reasonable value of the services, plaintiff may prove a special contract to pay for the services at a certain rate and recover the reasonable value thereof not exceeding the contract price.[16] If plaintiff sues on both a contract of employment and an account annexed for services performed, he may, on sufficient evidence, recover on the account annexed, even though he fails to establish the special contract declared on;[17] and a judgment for plaintiff in conformity to the pleadings and issues is not invalidated by allegations in the complaint which are insufficient to bring plaintiff within the terms of a statute enlarging his remedy.[18] In an action to recover on a claim for labor performed, and not to establish a lien, the mere fact that another person holds money due the em-

Where, under the evidence, defendant's liability for plaintiff's expenses is dependent on liability for salary, and plaintiff is entitled to both salary and expenses or to neither one, a judgment for expenses alone is inconsistent.—Rothe v. ployer does not authorize a judgment against such person.[19]

In order to accomplish justice and avoid a multiplicity of suits, it may be necessary that the court render judgment for commissions not yet matured and stay execution until their maturities.[20] Under some statutes the judgment must state that it is for a particular class of services in order to prevent the employer from claiming exemptions against it.[21]

In an action for accounting, an order making a correct disposition of the case will be upheld;[22] but an interlocutory judgment appointing a referee to state the account cannot be had in advance of the trial on the issues raised by defendant's denial of his liability.[23]

§ 135. Appeal and Error

Questions of appellate review arising in civil actions generally, including those arising in actions by employees for compensation, are discussed in Appeal and Error § 1 et seq.

§ 136. Costs and Attorney's Fees

The general rules as to costs in civil actions apply in an action by an employee to recover compensation. An attorney's fee is allowable where there is a statute authorizing such an allowance.

In accordance with the general rules as to costs in civil cases, which general rules apply in an action by an employee to recover compensation,[24] costs in the trial court may be assessed against the employer where he admits owing the wages sued for, even though the judgment is modified on appeal by excluding a penalty also sued for.[25] In the absence of a statute or rule authorizing such allowance, the reasonable value of the services of an accountant employed by plaintiff will not be allowed as costs.[26]

An attorney's fee will be allowed when,[27] and only when,[28] there is a statute providing for such allowance and the case is within the statute. Under some statutes it is not necessary to plead or prove an attorney's fee as an item of costs;[29] but under other statutes the allowance is not made in the absence of proof.[30] The reasonableness of the award is not open to attack where it is supported by uncontradicted proof.[31]

Where state or state official is party. Under some statutes a state labor department, division, or commissioner taking assignments, and prosecuting actions for the collection, of wage claims of persons financially unable to employ counsel is, with certain specified exceptions,[32] not required to pay costs;[33] but a statute dispensing with security for costs in an action by an employee against his employer on a wage claim is not applicable in an action against the state.[34]

§ 137. Damages and Amount of Recovery

The recovery must not exceed the amount warranted by the contract and the evidence. Interest does not run prior to the date of the judgment where the amount of compensation due and unpaid is not definitely ascertained until then.

In an action strictly for wages or commissions, ordinarily the employee's recovery is limited to the amount due at the time the action is brought;[35] but it is otherwise where the complaint is amended to cover commissions coming due after the commencement of the suit and before trial and the evidence as to such commissions is admitted.[36] The employee may not recover wages or salary for a period of time beyond the termination of the contract.[37] Where he sues on an express contract, his recovery is restricted in amount by the wages agreed on;[38] but the fact that the jury, by their verdict, find the reasonable value of plaintiff's services, rather than the stipulated compensation, is immaterial where the amount of the verdict is in fact the amount fixed by the agreement.[39]

Plaintiff is entitled to recover in accordance with a wage scale fixed in a contract made for his benefit between a labor union and defendant where the evidence does not support a claim of a subsequent contract between plaintiff and defendant for lower wages.[40] Where a labor union, having absolute control of the labor market in respect of workers of a certain class, entered into a contract whereby the employer agreed to pay his employees the rate fixed by the union for other employers in the locality, it has been held that the employer may recover from the union the loss he suffered by continuing to pay his employees a higher rate after the union lowered the rate without notifying him.[41]

The correct measure of damages for a breach of contract by failure to pay the employee the agreed salary for the entire period of his employment is not the total amount of the agreed monthly payments for the remainder of the contract period after the last payment, but is the value, as of the date of the breach, of the promise to pay the agreed amount monthly for the remainder of the period.[42] A salesman suing for breach of contract to pay commissions he would have earned may recover only the difference between the gross commissions contracted for and the necessary expenses in earning them;[43] and plaintiff, if entitled to recover for breach of contract to raise his salary, may recover only the present worth of reasonable increases not exceeding the salaries paid in the department of the business in which he was employed.[44] Special damages are not recoverable where the employer is not guilty of a breach of his contractual or other obligations to the employee;[45] and the doctrine of mitigation of damages has no place in an action on the contract of employment for the agreed compensation, as distinguished from an action for damages for breach of contract.[46] An employer who has failed to establish that he sustained damages as a result of his employee's negligence may not recover on his counterclaim in the employee's action for an accounting and recovery of commissions.[47] Damages for breach of a contract to employ are discussed supra § 11, and for wrongful discharge supra §§ 58, 59. Liquidated damages under Fair Labor Standards Act are considered infra § 160 (12).

Computation of profits or commissions. It is proper to compute commissions in the manner provided by the contract.[48] Where, under the contract, plaintiff employee is entitled to a certain per cent of net profit, it is error for the court, in computing profits, to allow one of the defendants a higher salary than such defendant testified he received;[49] and where, under the contract, no item of cost is to be deducted except such as has been approved by plaintiff, an item which has not been so approved is not deductible,[50] but an item which has been so approved is deductible, even though, because of the destruction thereof by fire, defendant is not able to produce vouchers.[51]

Value of stock. The measure of recovery on a contract to pay plaintiff's salary in corporate stock is not the par value of the stock, but its actual value at the time specified for its issuance.[52] It would be unjust to allow plaintiff to recover as profits the value of stock at the time it was accepted from a third person in part payment of construction work by defendant where subsequent depreciation in the value of the stock resulted from plaintiff's own act.[53]

Reimbursement. Under a contract of employment giving the employee a right to purchase an interest in the business and providing for termination by either party, the employee is entitled, on termination, to recovery back of the sums paid by him in part payment of the interest in the business.[54]

A penalty for withholding wages after they are due cannot be recovered in the absence of valid statutory authorization.[55]

Interest from the date of the termination of the employment may be allowed, in accordance with the prayer of the complaint,[56] where there was an absolute obligation to pay plaintiff's wages at the end of each month;[57] but interest does not run prior to the date of the judgment where the claim is for the value of services requiring determination by the jury[58] or where the amount due is to be ascertained from an open account, the parties not having agreed on a balance.[59]

Nominal recovery. A judgment for defendant on the ground of failure to prove value must be reversed if there is proof of the services, plaintiff in such case being entitled at least to nominal damages.[60] In an action for commissions, plaintiff may be entitled to recover only a nominal amount where there was no specific agreement as to the basis for commissions and, under the agreement made, plaintiff was bound by the decision of defendant's sales director, as to whether he had earned a commission and, if so, the amount thereof.[61]

Inadequacy or excessiveness. Where the amount of the recovery is a mere matter of computation, a verdict is[62] or is not[63] excessive accordingly as it exceeds or equals the sum ascertained by such computation. If the amount depends on the facts of the case, the verdict or finding will be held to be excessive where it is plainly contrary to the evidence in the case;[64] otherwise it will be held to be not excessive.[65] Where the terms of employment are in dispute and the testimony is conflicting, the jury are not obliged to find that plaintiff is entitled to all he claims or nothing.[66] Nevertheless a verdict awarding plaintiff less than one sixth of what he is reasonably entitled to, if entitled to recover at all under conflicting evidence, is fatally defective and erroneous;[67] and, where no error is shown in an audit of defendant's books by an expert accountant employed by plaintiff, it is improper for the court to reduce the amount of plaintiff's claims to cover a possible error in the audit.[68]

5. Arbitration and Mediation

§ 138. Applicability of General Rules of Arbitration and Mediation

General arbitration rules apply as to the arbitration of a wage dispute.

The general rules of arbitration, discussed in Arbitration and Award § 1 et seq, and the general rules as to arbitration in labor disputes, discussed supra §§ 28 (72), 28 (73), apply as to the arbitration of a wage dispute.[69] The parties may validly contract to submit a wage dispute to arbitration,[70] and an employee may not avail himself of the wage provisions of a contract between the employer and the union without being bound by the arbitration provision of such contract;[71] but it has been held that a provision for the arbitration of disputes as to the performance and interpretation of a contract between an employer and its employees does not apply as to a claim for extra compensation under the Fair Labor Standards Act.[72] It has been held that a valid provision for the arbitration of wage disputes bars a civil action for wages until arbitration has been had in accordance with the contract,[73] but it has also been held that an agreement to arbitrate a wage dispute does not bar a civil action unless there is a further agreement which makes the award a condition precedent to an action.[74]

The arbitration award should be made within the time specified in the submission agreement, but where the parties have waived such provision the award may be made within a reasonable time.[75] The arbitrators must consider and determine all the essential issues in the dispute,[76] and the award should be final and definite.[77]

69. Wash.—Gord v. F. S. Harmon & Co., 61 P.2d 1294, 188 Wash. 134.

Appraisement

(1) Where the arbitrators or appraisers are to rely in some measure on their expert knowledge and experience, the submission is an appraisement rather than an arbitration.—Gord v. F. S. Harmon & Co., supra.

(2) Where the agreement provided for the fixing of a labor scale, or prices to be paid for merchandise, or both, it called for an appraisal or valuation.—Hegeberg v. New England Fish Co., 110 P.2d 182, 7 Wash. 2d 509.

Misconduct of arbitrator

Board of arbitrators' award in wage dispute was held not invalid on ground that arbitrator named to represent labor dominated board, where record failed to show such domination or that such member was guilty of any misconduct.—Gord v. F. S. Harmon & Co., 61 P.2d 1294, 188 Wash. 134.

Provision for arbitration of all disputes

Wage dispute was subject to arbitration under provisions of collective bargaining agreement between employer and union providing that all disputes should be promptly settled.—United Elec., Radio, and Mach. Workers of America, Local 411, C. I.O., v. National Pneumatic Co., supra.

Share of profits

Where written employment contract, providing for arbitration of parties' differences, was extended and continued in force until new salary arrangement was made, and there was no proof of cancellation of contract or release of employee's right to profits earned up to date of such arrangement, employee was entitled to arbitration for purpose of ascertaining his share of such profits.—Linne v. Stuyvesant Const. Corp., 51 N.Y.S.2d 877, 268 App.Div. 982, reargument denied 52 N.Y.S.2d 800, 268 App.Div. 1027.

Severance pay

Where contract between cable company and its employees provided for arbitration of all controversies, an order of the Defense Communications Board directing the closing of cable company's offices and facilities did not deprive employees of their right to arbitrate controversy concerning claims of employees for severance pay on their discharge, where such controversy did not involve continuance of employment or enforcement of any provision of contract which was rendered impossible of performance by the order.—Application of Selly, 37 N.Y.S.2d 398, 178 Misc. 1076, affirmed 38 N.Y.S.2d 362, 265 App.Div. 846.

Consideration

When employees returned to work in accordance with agreement for appraisal of value of wages, relied on by all parties in good faith, they furnished a consideration which was beneficial to employers.—Hegeberg v. New England Fish Co., 110 P.2d 182, 7 Wash.2d 509.

Breach of contract

A stipulation for the arbitration of wage disputes is not enforceable by one who has previously breached the contract.—In re Division 132, Amalgamated Ass'n of Street & Electric Ry. Employees, 188 N.Y.S. 353, 196 App.Div. 206—63 C.J. p 673 note 76.

Waiver

Fact that in prior litigation employer had not invoked clause of contract with labor union providing for arbitration of disputes did not affect employer's right to arbitration of employee's claim for higher wages under provisions of the contract.—P. S. Thorsen & Co. v. Neves, supra.

Award held not final and definite

Arbitrator's award providing that minimum wages prescribed by the contract should advance a specified per cent unless employer should elect within ten days after the award in an arbitration involving a third person, to substitute for such

Ordinarily a valid arbitration award is binding on the parties.[78] The payment of a wage award under protest, in order to avoid a strike and the possible taking over of the plant by the government, is not an acquiescence in the award,[79] nor does it render the controversy moot in so far as the right to a judicial review of the award is concerned.[80]

Under the Transportation Act of 1920, 45 U.S.C.A. §§ 131–146, an award by the Railroad Labor Board as to a wage dispute was advisory only[81] and the railroad was not required to procure the board's consent to a change in wage rates.[82] The right of an employee and employer to agree as to the amount of wages, however, was subject to the right of the railway labor board to investigate and give the parties the benefit of the moral sanction of its decision.[83]

Under the Railway Labor Act, 45 U.S.C.A. § 151 et seq, a carrier may not reduce wages while the controversy as to such reduction is pending before the National Mediation Board.[84]

6. Liens and Preferences

§ 139. In General

a. In general
b. Under statute

a. In General

In the absence of statute or contract conferring it, an employee has no lien for his wages.

At common law a servant has no lien for his compensation.[85] Independent of statute or a contract provision for a lien, an employee has no wage lien and is not authorized to take or retain property of his employer until his wages are paid,[86] nor is he entitled to a lien on a manufactured article which is in part the product of his labor.[87]

If, however, the workman is in fact a bailee rather than a servant he has a common-law lien, as discussed in Bailments §§ 5, 35.

utes conferring a lien or preference on an employee for his labor. While ordinarily such statutes are denied an extraterritorial or retroactive effect, they have in some cases been held subject to a rule of liberal construction.

The statutes in many of the states expressly provide for a lien or preference in favor of a servant to protect his claim for wages. These statutes vary greatly in their terms, and, while some of them provide for a lien enforceable against the property of the employer independent of his insolvency, others provide for a preference for claims for wages for work performed before the seizure of the employer's property on process or the suspension of his business by the action of creditors or before his property is, by any other means, put in the hands of a receiver or trustee, the statutory preference in itself not giving the employee a specific lien on the property.[88] The purpose of such statutes is the protection of the worker[89] and they have been generally held valid.[90] Some authorities construe them liberally in favor of the employee;[91] others hold that such statutes should be construed strictly,[92] and should not be extended by implication.[93] In this connection it has been said that such statutes should be liberally construed in the enforcement of a lien once attached,[94] but not in determining the existence of the lien.[95] In any event the statutes confer a lien only in those cases falling within their terms.[96]

Statutes giving laborers a lien for wages due are not given an extraterritorial effect,[97] and they will not be given a retroactive effect unless they expressly provide therefor.[98] The courts do not favor repeal of such statutes by implication.[99] Thus an earlier lien statute in favor of employees generally has been held not repealed by the subsequent enactment of a preference statute in favor of employees of insolvent employers,[1] and a statute providing that laborers shall have a lien on the real property of their employers for their wages is not repealed by implication by a mechanics' lien act.[2]

Distinctions. Statutory liens on the master's property intended to secure payment of employees of manufacturers and others have been distinguished from mechanics' liens.[3]

Distributed among creditors

Little analogy

A mechanic's lien bears little analogy to the modern statutory liens on the master's property intended to secure the payment of wages of a class of employees of manufacturers and others, commonly designated as "laborers" and "servants."—Moore-Mansfield Constr. Co. v. Indianapolis, N. & T. R. Co., supra.

(2) On Corporate Property

Under statutes in some jurisdictions, preferences or liens are accorded to employees of corporations.

Under statutes in some jurisdictions, employees of corporations are given liens on their property for the value of work and labor performed by them.[4] The employee's preference or lien against corporate property is purely statutory in character[5] and has been held to be unaffected by recording acts.[6] Under statutes creating wage liens for employees of corporations, an employee of an individual is not entitled to a lien.[7] Under statutes giving employees of a corporation, doing business in the state, a lien on all of the corporate property for unpaid wages for labor performed, supplies furnished to a corporation are not "labor"[8] even though labor constitutes one of the elements in the cost of the supplies furnished.[9]

Corporate contracts under which money or merchandise will become the property of the corporation on performance of the contract represent assets[10] and are corporate "property" within the meaning of such statutes,[11] and the property of an insolvent corporation subject to wage lien may be regarded as its net worth or interest after satisfaction of prior encumbrances.[12] A contract with a corporation to deliver to it certain merchandise, although the contract is assigned by the corporation before the merchandise comes into its hands, is property under the statutes.[13] Under statutes giving the employees of corporations doing business in the state a first lien for unpaid wages on all the corporate property and further providing that any employee wishing to acquire the lien shall file a notice of his intention to do so, and that, when recorded, the lien shall date from the time of his employment, a purchaser of property from a corporation takes it subject to the liens of its employees whose employment antedates the time of sale,[14] and this has been held to be so even when the property is sold to the purchaser before the notice required in the statute has been filed.[15]

§ 140. Nature and Amount of Claim

A statutory lien or preference for compensation of an employee ordinarily is based on wages or salary as distinguished from a "bonus" or damages for breach of contract, and the amount of the lien is limited to compensation for work actually done and to such limits as may be imposed by statute.

The statutory lien or preference must be based on a claim for wages or other compensation for services, as discussed infra § 141, and not on a bonus[16] or a claim for damages for breach of contract.[17] The amount is limited to compensation for the work actually done[18] at the contract rate,[19] and not exceeding statutory restrictions as to the amount of the claim.[20] It has been held that the lien confers no right of possession of the property to which it attaches.[21] Where, however, possession is essential under the terms of the statute, a watchman's possession of a closed mine has been held sufficient to support his lien for unpaid wages.[22]

4. Doing business within state

Limitations. Under some statutes, there is a limitation of time within which wages, forming the basis of a claim for lien or preference, must have accrued.[23] Under other statutes it is immaterial how long before the date of the insolvency the wages may have accrued.[24]

§ 141. Character and Extent of Services

An employee's lien for compensation may be dependent on the character of service rendered and is usually restricted to wages for actual labor performed by the employee personally.

Under some statutory provisions the right to an employee's lien or preference is dependent on the character of his service,[25] the test being the nature of the service he was employed to perform rather than the nature of that he actually performed.[26] Under some statutes a lien for wages is allowable only when they are payable weekly or monthly,[27] but under other statutes it has been held to be immaterial whether the compensation is by the day, week, or month or by piece, weight, or measurement.[28]

Personal labor. The statutes are generally construed as intended to protect only claims for actual work or labor performed by the employees personally,[29] and to exclude claims for the use of teams[30] or machinery,[31] or for materials furnished,[32] for the labor of others hired by the employee,[33] or for the hire of other property of the employee,[34] for expenses incurred by the employee,[35] or for interest accrued on the claim for wages.[36]

§ 142. Character of Business in Which Services Performed

In order to be entitled to a lien, an employee must be employed in the kind of business or by the kind of employer specified in the statute.

Exclusion of executives

Statute giving "wage claimant" preference against proceeds of sale of employer's property was not intended to give general executive officers of corporations preference, but was enacted to protect classes of laborers, mechanics, and other wage earners therein enumerated.—Davis v. Nanty Glo Auto Co., 187 A. 227, 123 Pa.Super. 349.

Overseer or superintendent

(1) Under statutory provisions conferring a lien for wages in favor of persons performing labor or services for others on the personal property of the latter on which the labor or service is performed, or which is used in the business, occupation, or employment in which the labor or service is performed, an overseer or "woods rider" for a turpentine operator has a lien for his services in supervising the manual labor of workers chipping trees, dipping gum, etc., for the turpentine operator, the character of the overseer's services being within the contemplation of the statute.—Griffith v. Hulion, 107 So. 354, 90 Fla. 582.

(2) Under such statutory provisions a superintendent of a stone manufacturer was entitled to a lien for unpaid salary on personal property used by the manufacturer in its business.—Florida Travertine Corporation v. Staples, 150 So. 599, 112 Fla. 344.

Operation of commissary

Under statutes creating a lien in favor of the employees of any mine, rolling mill, foundry, or other manufacturing establishment for their wages, one employed merely in running a store or commissary for such an establishment is not entitled to a lien for wages.—Freeman v. Under statutes restricting the privilege to employees in particular kinds of business or employees hired by particular kinds of employers, only such employees as are engaged in the kind of business or hired by the kind of employer designated in the statute are entitled to a lien or preference for their wages.[37] Employees of companies engaged in lumbering and transporting logs to the mills are entitled to the lien under some statutes,[38] but not under other statutes.[39] The classes of employers reached by these acts are sometimes enlarged by necessary implication beyond a literal meaning of the words used in the statute in defining the specific groups named, in order to make it correspond with the classes of employees named, the words "other business," so interpreted, including all kinds of business in which any of the classes of employees named are engaged.[40] For example, statutes giving the privilege to clerks generally and restricting their application to "works, mines, manufactory, or other business" where clerks are employed have been construed as applying to attorney's offices in which clerks are employed.[41] Under some statutes the labor must have been performed in connection with the business in which the insolvent employer was engaged[42] and must have contributed to its permanent and continuous use,[43] so that services performed in the construction and equipment of the plant preparatory to commencing the employer's business are not entitled to a preference.[44] Also it has been held that, while the words "in any manufactory or mill" should be construed to mean in or about any such place, one rendering services miles distant from the mill and having no immediate connection with its actual operation, even though furthering the business of the mill, is not entitled to the lien.[45]

§ 143. Employees Protected

a. In general
b. Particular occupations

a. In General

The terms of the statute determine what employees are entitled to a wage lien. Independent contractors ordinarily are excluded.

The right of a person to a laborer's lien is determined by the terms of the statute under which he claims,[46] and that right will not be affected by a later laborers' lien statute not repealing or modifying the earlier statute and not including claimant within its terms.[47] Where the classes entitled to the lien are enumerated, the statute is construed as excluding those not enumerated,[48] and the fact that an employee belonging to a class not enumerated in the statute sometimes performs the duties of employees who are enumerated has been held not to entitle him to a lien.[49] Under some statutes only claimants employed under written contracts are entitled to the lien;[50] but under others the written contract is required only where the employment is for a longer period than that fixed by the statute.[51] It has been held that the employee, in order to be entitled to a preference, must have been an employee at the time of the suspension of business[52]

Manufacturer

(1) Under statute creating lien on property or effects of owner of manufacturing establishment when property shall in anywise come to be distributed among creditors for wages coming due within six months before property shall come to be distributed, a contractor who agreed to cut, haul, and deliver logs to sawmill was a manufacturer, and his employees were entitled to benefits of statute.—Leslie's Adm'x v. (2) Other cases see 39 C.J. p 217 note 33 [c].

Merchant

Under statutes providing a lien in favor of employees of "merchants, transportation companies and other corporations," one employed by an individual turpentine operator was not entitled to a lien, and the fact that such turpentine operator incidentally ran a commissary or store did not render him a "merchant" within the contemplation of the statute so as to confer a lien on his employee, who was an overseer or "woods rider" engaged in supervising the manual labor of chippers and dippers.—Griffith v. and also that an unsuccessful claimant under the Mechanics' Lien Law cannot claim a preference under the Laborers' Lien Law as a laborer or mechanic working simply for wages.[53]

Contractors. A person cannot have a laborer's lien for work done by others hired by him, as considered supra § 141; and it is almost universally held that a contractor is not entitled to a preference or a lien[54] even though he performs manual labor in part.[55] The fact that a company advances industrial insurance premiums in behalf of alleged independent contractors is a factor for consideration, but does not of itself change the relationship to that of master and servant.[56] However, the fact that a foreman is allowed a certain amount for his own compensation and that of the workmen under him whom he employs, he receiving the balance after payment of the men's wages, does not make him an independent contractor within the meaning of the rule, where the employer pays the men and retains the control and direction of them.[57]

b. Particular Occupations

The right of persons in particular occupations, such as clerks, laborers, and others, to a wage lien is controlled by the provisions of the particular statute invoked.

The question whether one engaged in any particular occupation is entitled to a laborer's or employee's lien for his wages or salary will be determined by the provisions of the statute invoked.[58] Under statutes conferring a lien for the value of his work on every workman, laborer, or other person who shall perform any work or labor for any incorporated company doing business in the state, a general manager may be entitled to a lien as an "other person,"[59] as may a bank cashier,[60] and the fact that he is also a stockholder, director, or officer of the corporation will not deprive him of his lien.[61]

Clerks. Under statutes conferring a privilege for their salaries on clerks, secretaries and other agents of that nature, the question whether one comes within the privilege conferred will depend on the character of duties he is expected to discharge and does discharge,[62] and not on the name given to the position held.[63] The term "clerk" includes a stenographer[64] and a law clerk,[65] but does not include a traveling salesman[66] or one employed in and about a pool room to perform general work.[67] An employer who lets out the services of a bookkeeper is not entitled to a preference for his wages, since the employer himself is not a clerk.[68]

Employees. The term "employee" is a word of more comprehensive signification than "laborers" or "operatives"[69] and has been held to include all persons who are employed.[70] As used in the body of the statute it is limited, however, to "laborers," where the latter word is the only one used in the title of the statute.[71] The persons included may be limited by other terms of the statute to employees engaged in a particular branch only of the business,[72] as, for example, to employees of a coal mining company engaged in the work of developing and opening up of coal mines, it being held that a watchman who also collected accounts for the mining company was not entitled under such statute.[73] The term has been held to include a traveling salesman,[74] a bookkeeper,[75] and one employed to assist the general manager of a corporation in keeping its books, shipping goods, etc.;[76] but it does not include a contractor,[77] or a district manager of an insurance company,[78] or one working on a commission basis.[79]

Laborers. A "laborer," as the term is used in statutes conferring wage liens on such persons, has been defined as a manual worker, one who labors with his hands.[80] The courts have also defined the term to mean one who labors in a toilsome occupation, a man who does work that requires little skill as distinguished from an artisan;[81] but the term cannot be confined exclusively to one who performs only services that require no skill.[82] The test as to whether or not one should be classified as a laborer under such statutes lies in the character of services required of him under his contract[83] and not in any arbitrary designation given his calling.[84] The courts have construed the term to apply to a bartender who is also required to keep books,[85] a driver of a milk wagon,[86] a farm laborer[87] and workers about a dairy,[88] a mechanic who performs actual manual labor for his employer,[89] and a worker in an iron foundry regardless of whether he was paid by the day or piece;[90] but it has been held not to apply to a bookkeeper,[91] a professional chemist,[92] a civil engineer,[93] a clerk, even though he performs some amount of manual labor, provided he did not in fact contract to perform labor which was mainly physical,[94] a contractor,[95] an architect's draftsman,[96] a pharmacist,[97] an officer of the em-

Mental or manual work

If services contemplated by employment contract consist mainly of work requiring mental skill or business capacity and involve exercise of intellectual faculties rather than physical or manual labor, employee is not a laborer within laborer's lien statute but if services to be performed by employee under employment contract consist mainly of manual labor, he is a laborer within laborer's lien statute.—Bell v. Performance of additional duties

"Laborer," within statute giving laborer lien, is one who performs manual labor, but includes employee whose regular duties include actual manual labor, although he performs other services and a waitress was held a "laborer" entitled to laborer's lien, although, in addition to performing regular waitress' duties, she acted as cashier, purchased groceries, and made entries in books.—Aronoff v. ployer corporation,[98] a salesman paid by commissions,[99] a manager,[1] or a superintendent.[2]

A statute defining the term "laborer" as including all persons performing labor or services of whatever character has been held to apply to a drayman[3] and to a bookkeeper who is incidentally a director of the employer corporation but with no pecuniary interest therein,[4] but not to apply to the president of the employer corporation,[5] even to the extent that he assists the manager in conducting the business at the request of the directors.[6] Under a statute giving a preference to "debts owing for labor," one employed by a manufacturer of milling machinery to install machinery to be sold to its customers is entitled to a preference,[7] but a general traveling agent is not,[8] even though he occasionally does manual work in adjusting machines sold.[9] The same statute has been held not to apply to a contractor who works with his men where the value of his own services cannot be separated from the profits of the contract,[10] or to a lumber inspector although he performs considerable manual labor.[11] Statutes similarly worded have been held to apply to a chemist,[12] a foreman who performed manual labor,[13] and to an officer of a corporation who performed manual services for the corporation clearly outside of his duties as such officer,[14] but not to apply to a bookkeeper[15] or to a salesman.[16] A statute conferring a wage lien on "common laborers" and "farm hands" does not include the manager of a farm,[17] and, despite the fact that he performs some manual labor, such a manager does not come within the purview of the statute "as one who labors with his hands for wages."[18]

Operatives. The term "operative" has no well defined meaning as distinguished from a laborer, although it is more commonly used in connection with persons employed in manufacturing establishments.[19] It does not include a secretary of a manufacturing company, although he acted as manager and superintendent and incidentally performed manual labor.[20]

Salesmen. The term "salesmen" includes a district representative located in a specific district to solicit orders for his employer and entitled to commissions on sales made by subordinate salesmen in his district.[21]

Tradesmen. A statute granting the privilege to "tradesmen" does not apply to a laundryman carrying on an independent business.[22]

§ 144. Inception and Duration of Lien

A lien may attach as of the date of performance of the labor and will last only for the time prescribed by law.

Broadly speaking, the inception and duration of an employee's or laborer's lien for wages will be controlled by the provisions of the particular statute.[23] A lien attaches under some statutes as of the

Watchman's lien to date of sale

Watchman in charge of closed mine property who remained in employment and was not discharged after making demand for payment of wages preparatory to foreclosing lien therefor, could claim wages and had lien to secure payment thereof

date of the performance of the labor[24] so that the lien may vest when the wages become due and are unpaid[25] or on termination of the employment,[26] and, if the employer dies indebted, his estate in the hands of his personal representatives is charged with the lien.[27] Where, however, the employee is merely given a right to a preferred claim against the property of his employer which has been levied on under attachment, execution, or writs of similar nature, the right to assert the preference and claim the statutory lien vests in claimant immediately on the levy of the writ.[28]

The lien or privilege will last only for the time prescribed by law[29] and is sometimes limited by statute to a specified number of days,[30] and it does not continue after the employer has sold his property to a bona fide purchaser for value.[31] The lien ceases after the employee has been paid[32] or after he has become indebted to his employer for a sum greater than the employer's indebtedness to him.[33] However, payment by the owner to the contractor will not affect the right of a laborer to a statutory lien for work done under the contractor, provided the owner had notice or knowledge that the laborer was engaged in work on his property.[34]

§ 145. Subject Matter to Which Lien Attaches

Generally speaking, an employee's wage lien attaches only to the property of his employer which is of a character specified in the statute.

The lien or preference attaches only to the property of the employer[35] or its proceeds,[36] and not to the property of a third person in the employer's possession.[37] Property subject to the lien has been held to include trust estates[38] and leaseholds,[39] but not funds of the employer in the hands of a garnishee.[40] The law as to choses in action differs in the various states, some holding that such property is subject to the lien,[41] others that it is not.[42] In some states there are statutes subjecting real and personal property generally of the employer to the lien, and others specifying particular articles. In such cases the statutes have been held cumulative.[43] Under statutes confining an employee's wage lien to personal property, it will not attach to any property not yet detached from realty.[44] A change in the form of the property will not necessarily destroy the lien.[45]

Where the statute provides for preferences to labor claimants, where the property of the debtor is seized under any process to pay his debts, the laborer is not entitled to a preference where the property has been released by the sheriff, and is no longer in the custody of the court.[49]

After-acquired property. In the absence of statute extending the lien to such property, an employee's wage lien will not attach to property of his employer acquired after the vesting of the lien.[50]

§ 146. Assignment

Assignment of a wage claim may carry with it any wage lien which has attached.

While it has been held that the lien or priority of a laborer's claim is personal to the laborer and does not pass to his assignee,[51] it has also been held that, where a lien for wages has attached, it may be assigned by an assignment of the claim for wages[52] without express subrogation,[53] and the assignee may assert the claim and enforce the lien in the same manner, and to the same extent, as the laborer.[54] The assignee's claim, however, in order to be entitled to preference, must be for money advanced to the laborers themselves on the faith of their preference, as distinguished from a mere advance to the employer with which to pay the laborers.[55]

A mere delivery by a laborer to a store of a store order issued by the employer without any assignment of such order does not operate as an assignment of the laborer's lien,[56] nor does a drawing by the laborer of an order on his employer to pay his wages to a third person operate as an assignment of his lien to the payee.[57] A statutory preference given to employees of insolvent corporations has been held not to give them a vested, potential, or expectant legal right, capable of assignment until a receiver is appointed,[58] and hence, where a claim for wages was assigned before such time, the assignee has no lien.[59] So also, in the states where there are statutes declaring that only persons in the employ of an insolvent corporation at the time it is declared insolvent are entitled to a preference, it follows that, where wages are assigned before the declaration of insolvency, the assignee has no right to a preference.[60]

Waiver. Where the assignor has waived a labor lien, his assignee may not recover thereon.[61]

§ 147. Priorities

Ordinarily a wage lien is preferred to subsequent, but not to prior, liens.

Ordinarily laborers' liens have priority over other liens subsequently accruing,[62] but not over liens pre-its of turpentine or resin.—Griffith v. Hulion, supra.

Conflict with federal statutes

As long as a state statute giving priority to debts owing to laborers or servants for services conforms to iously acquired.[63] Liens[64] or claims under contracts[65] existing before the passage of the statute creating the laborer's lien are entitled to priority. Priority will be accorded a labor lien only on a due showing of the facts required by statute as prerequisite to such priority.[66] One set or group of laborers has been held not entitled to priority over another group claiming under the same law.[67] The costs occasioned by the seizure of the property of the employer, where the employee is given a lien on property in the hands of a receiver, officer, or other trustee, are generally expressly declared by statute to be a superior lien.[68] It has been held that an unforeclosed laborer's lien cannot participate in a fund, brought into court under other process, which is the subject of controversy in a money-rule case.[69] Statutory provisions granting employees priority for wages for services rendered within a specified period next preceding levy of writ in case of execution, attachment, and like writs are designed to include all cases in which the employer's property is sold under judicial process to satisfy his debts.[70]

General creditors. Laborers' liens have priority over general creditors both with and without notice.[71]

Purchasers. Under statutes expressly so providing, a laborers' lien has priority over the claim of a purchaser with notice,[72] but no priority over a purchaser without actual or constructive notice of the lien.[73] It has been held in some states that one who takes a transfer of his debtor's property in payment of his claim is entitled to priority over the employees of his debtor, the statute giving a lien to such employees in case of judicial, not voluntary, sales.[74] If parcels of the property subject to the lien have been sold at different times they must be exhausted in the inverse order of alienation.[75]

Mechanic's lien. Where priority provisions of a corporate employees' lien law are in direct conflict with a subsequently enacted mechanic's lien law, the latter will prevail.[76] A laborers' lien has priority over a mechanics' lien under a statute providing that laborers or employees shall be preferred creditors and shall be first paid in full,[77] or under a statute giving laborers' liens a priority over all other liens except mortgages or judgments entered before the labor is performed.[78]

the general policy of federal statutes, such as those relating to bankruptcy, the state is acting within the orbit of its authority in dealing with laborers' claims.—Emory v. St. James Distillery, Mo.App., 143 S.W. 2d 318, reversed on other grounds 62 S.Ct. 317, 314 U.S. 423, 86 L.Ed. 315.

Circumstances entitling mechanics' lien to priority

(1) The fact that mechanics' liens were not enforced within one year as against holders of corporation employees' liens, although enforced against original owner of realty within one year, did not prevent assertion of mechanics' liens as against one claiming through sheriff's sale resulting from foreclosure of corporation employees' liens, where corporation employees' liens were not enforced against holder of mechanics' liens within time required by statute.—Watson v. Strohl, supra.

(2) One who claimed through sheriff's sale resulting from foreclosure of corporation employees' liens did not have a claim prior to claim of holder of mechanics' liens because judgment on corporation employees' liens was rendered prior to date of judgment on mechanics' liens, where mechanics' liens had priority over corporation employees' liens, since judgment foreclosing a lien relates back to date of lien.—Watson v. Strohl, supra.

Vendor's lien. In the absence of a statute giving them protection, laborers are not entitled to have their claims take precedence over a vendor's lien,[79] but an employee's lien may be accorded priority under statute.[80]

§ 148. —— Mortgages

Ordinarily, as between employees' wage liens and mortgage liens, the lien first in time is first in right, in the absence of statutes providing otherwise.

As between a laborer's lien and a mortgage or trust deed in the nature thereof, ordinarily the lien first in time is first in right;[81] a laborer's lien is superior to a subsequent mortgage,[82] but inferior to a prior mortgage.[83] While the lien of a trust deed in the nature of a mortgage ordinarily obtains priority over a laborer's lien as of the time of filing for record or actual notice,[84] nevertheless a laborer's lien of which no notice has been recorded in the public records may be superior in time and right to the lien of a recorded mortgage,[85] as where the debt secured by the trust deed or mortgage came into existence subsequent to the acquisition of the laborer's lien.[86] In a suit to foreclose a lien for labor for a lessee of a business, the lien of the laborer has been held superior to a mortgage executed subsequent to the lease.[87]

Under some statutory provisions a laborer's lien may be granted priority over a previously recorded mortgage[88] placed on the property by the employer himself,[89] and provided, under some statutes, the labor for which the lien is claimed produces the thing on which the lien is claimed.[90] It has been held that the laborers' claim does not take precedence over a prior mortgage, where the statute gives only a preference,[91] but under other statutes it has been held that the laborers' claim has priority over the prior mortgage.[92]

One taking a mortgage at or after the time of construction work on the mortgaged premises takes subject to laborer's liens and the mortgage is inferior thereto.[93]

Purchase-money mortgages. Laborers' claims have priority over purchase-money mortgages under statutes creating liens,[94] and in some jurisdictions such priority is allowed notwithstanding the statute gives merely a preference.[95]

a. In General

Statutory requirements with respect to the perfection or enforcement of wage liens must be followed.

Statutory requirements with respect to the perfection or enforcement of wage liens must be followed,[96] either strictly[97] or substantially.[98] Under particular statutory provisions it has been held that the employee seeking to perfect or enforce a wage lien must make a claim[99] or affidavit[1] and file notice of a lien[2] within the time specified by the statute[3] and record it.[4]

The notice or complaint for enforcement of a wage lien should properly aver the facts essential to the proceeding[5] and the employee should allege and prove the existence of the master and servant relationship,[6] the services rendered,[7] the reasonableness of his charges,[8] and a performance of all statutory conditions.[9] The employee, however, is not called on to offer proof of facts not required by the statute,[10] as, for example, that he and his employer had the lien in mind when the employment contract was made;[11] nor is it necessary for him to prove a sworn and itemized statement of his claim where he seeks merely a preference under the statute and not a lien.[12]

Counter-affidavits. The filing of a counter-affidavit is under some statutes necessary to raise an issue,[13] and, on the filing of an affidavit setting forth the facts essential to give rise to a wage lien, execution which issues instanter constitutes final process unless arrested or controverted by counter-affidavit.[14] Where, however, the employer interposes a counter-affidavit denying that he owes the amount claimed or that the laborer has the right to the lien claimed the proceeding is converted into mesne process,[15] and issue formed is returnable to the proper court for disposition.[16] Where, in a proceeding for foreclosure of a laborer's lien, the employer elects to proceed by counter-affidavit, he may thus contest the claim without giving bond and replevying the property;[17] but, where in such a proceeding he does give a bond, the fact that plaintiff causes dismissal of the counter-affidavit for failure of the bond to meet statutory requirements does not prevent plaintiff from suing on the bond as a common-law contract.[18]

The counter-affidavit must allege facts showing that the laborer is not entitled to the lien or that the amount claimed is too large,[19] and it may be interposed at any time before the sale of defendant's property.[20] If not filed with the proper officer[21] or if it is void[22] defendant is not in a position to

When returnable

In proceeding to foreclose laborer's lien, where counter-affidavit was filed on Oct. 18, 1932, proceeding then became mesne process and was returnable to the next term of court, and trial judge erred in rendering judgment during October, 1932, term of court against defendant and his bondsmen.—Kennedy v. Counter-affidavit held sufficient

Counter-affidavit to foreclosure of laborer's lien sufficiently complied with statute, where counter-affidavit set up that defendants were only indebted to plaintiff in specified part of sum claimed and stated that defendants "plead the same as a tender and pay the same into court."—Harris v. Filing held timely

(1) Where laborer's lien was foreclosed September 21, case was made returnable to October term which convened October 17, and was called for trial on October 18, filing of counter-affidavit with sheriff on October 18 was timely and converted proceeding into mesne process, where sheriff filed counter-affidavit with clerk before any ruling or judgment was rendered and before property levied on was sold.—Kennedy v. Miller, 175 S.E. 588, 179 Ga. 234, answer conformed to 176 S.E. 102, 49 Ga.App. 505.

(2) Counter-affidavit to foreclosure of laborer's lien, interposed before property was sold, alleging that plaintiff had been paid in full and that defendants resided in county other than county in which affidavit was filed held timely and sufficient to form issue to be tried, requiring return of papers to proper court in county where defendants resided.—Harris v. have a ruling as to the validity of the foreclosure or levy and his demurrer to claimant's affidavit is properly overruled.[23]

Labor performed in foreign state. Even if a lien for labor performed in a foreign state may be enforced in the state of the forum, it is essential first to show that a lien existed for such foreign labor by virtue either of contract or of the law of the foreign state.[24]

Claims of third persons. Where property of some one other than the employer has been levied on under execution on foreclosure of a laborers' lien, the proper proceeding for the owner to take is to move to dismiss the levy, not the foreclosure proceedings.[25] An intervener may not complain of seizure of property to enforce a laborer's lien unless he can prove ownership thereof.[26] All interested persons should be made parties to a suit to foreclose a laborer's lien.[27]

Equity jurisdiction. Power to adjudicate laborers' liens may be conferred on courts of equity.[28] It has been held that a suit for conversion of property on which plaintiff had a wage lien will lie only in equity.[29]

Estoppel of employer. Defendant in a suit on a replevin bond given in connection with proceedings to enforce a labor lien may be estopped to deny that claimant was an employee entitled to such a lien;[30] and an employer may be estopped to move to dissolve an attachment to enforce a lien claimed by his employee.[31]

Limitations may bar a proceeding to foreclose a laborer's lien.[32]

b. Evidence

Ordinarily the burden of proof rests on the claimant of a wage lien or preference to establish it. The general rules govern questions of admissibility and weight and sufficiency of the evidence arising in proceedings relative to enforcement of the lien.

Ordinarily the person claiming a preference[33] or laborer's lien[34] has the burden of proof. If the lien is given only when the wages are payable weekly or monthly, he must show such fact.[35] On the other hand, the rule placing the burden of proof on the lien claimant is inapplicable where a judgment foreclosing a labor lien is collaterally attacked by a stranger,[36] and in such a case the burden of proving that the claimant was not a laborer rests on a creditor filing a traverse.[37]

The general rules governing admissibility of evidence will ordinarily determine its admissibility in proceedings relative to enforcement of a wage lien.[38] Under general rules, evidence in particular cases has been held sufficient to support a verdict, finding, or judgment for[39] or against[40] an employee or laborer seeking to enforce his lien, or to show particular facts.[41] The rule, discussed in Evidence

c. Trial, Judgment, and Review

In proceedings relative to enforcement of an employee's wage lien, questions of fact ordinarily are for the jury. The judgment may be limited to a special judgment against the property and may include costs and attorney's fees in a proper case.

On the trial of proceedings relative to enforcement of an employee's wage lien, questions of fact[45] and conflicts in the evidence[46] are for the jury or trial judge. A finding in favor of a lien claimant must contain an express finding of every fact required by the statute to bring the claim within its terms,[47] and so, where the statute gives laborers paid by the week or month a lien, there must be a finding of an agreement to pay claimant by the week or month to justify a judgment in his favor,[48] since such fact cannot be added to the finding by presumption.[49]

Judgment and execution. The judgment in a foreclosure proceeding may be limited to a special judgment against the property,[50] and the appointment of a receiver may be necessary to sell the property and distribute the proceeds.[51] It has been held, where the property seized on foreclosure of a laborer's lien is not replevied, that a general judgment may not be returned,[52] but that the only judgment which may be rendered is one establishing the lien.[53] Judgment in favor of a lien plaintiff may be entered against a mortgagee and his agent, both parties defendant, where the parties stipulated that a judgment for claimant might be entered if his demurrer to defendants' answers is sustained and the demurrer is sustained.[54]

The execution issued on an affidavit may, under the particular statute, operate as a final process until arrested by a valid counter-affidavit raising an issue to be passed on by the proper tribunal, as discussed supra subdivision a of this section, and judgment for claimant is properly rendered on the replevy bond where defendant's counter-affidavit is not made and filed with the proper officer at the proper time,[55] and where it is shown that the replevy bond was made by defendant and left by him at the office of the proper officer for filing, even though the latter fails to do so, the court in such case ordering an entry of its filing nunc pro tunc.[56]

One having a privilege on personal property as an employee has been held entitled to have a writ of sequestration sustained, even though another person is entitled to payment by preference over him.[57]

The right to costs and attorney's fees in proceedings for enforcement of a wage lien will be determined by the provisions of the statutes as interpreted and applied in the light of the circumstances of the particular case,[58] an allowance for attorney's ed contract with lumber company, which had effect of making crew independent contractors, as witnesses and not as parties, so that they would be entitled to lien for wages, notwithstanding contract.—Hollingsworth v. Robe Lumber Co., supra.

46. Ga.—Westbrook v. Chandler, 167 S.E. 322, 46 Ga.App. 288.

In action to enforce a laborer's lien, evidence presented jury question as to whether person employing plaintiffs, in defendant's lumber yard, to peel and cut poles was defendant's foreman rather than an independent contractor employed by defendant, and whether agents of defendant guaranteed that defendant would pay plaintiffs for their labor.—Moss Tie & Timber Co. v. Blair, 138 S.W.2d 781, 200 Ark. 1190.

Evidence held insufficient to go to jury

Where property on which laborer sought to foreclose lien was claimed by third person as owner, evidence was insufficient to submit to jury an issue on the question of whether third person as owner had right or assumed right or control over employees of subcontractor named as defendant in the proceeding.—Farrar v. Joyce, 4 S.E.2d 708, 60 Ga. App. 675.

Effect of improper inclusion of attorney's fees

(1) Sale foreclosing lien on mine property for watchman's wages was held not invalid because attorney's fees were improperly included in lien claim, where balance of sale proceeds was to be paid to owner, there was no fraud, and excess could be segregated, but claimant was required to reimburse employer for excess.—Seafoam Mines Corporation fees being denied in some instances,[59] and allowed in others,[60] provided there is evidence as to what reasonable fees would be.[61] The purpose of statutes authorizing allowance of a reasonable amount as attorney's fees on foreclosure of a labor lien is to relieve the workman of that expense and impose it on the employer,[62] and the statutes contemplate that the award will suffice in event of an appeal.[63]

Review. A judgment will be affirmed where it is supported by some of the findings of fact, even though there are others to some extent conflicting, as, for example, a judgment in favor of a lien claimant on a finding that claimant worked for defendant, even though there is another finding that he worked for defendant and some one else.[64]

§ 150. Waiver and Forfeiture

An employee's wage lien may be lost by waiver or forfeiture.

The wage privilege or lien of an employee is subject to waiver,[65] as by acceptance of a contract lien, the terms of which are inconsistent with the statutory lien,[66] or the taking of a promissory note[67] or of a bill payable at a future date with interest,[68] although it has also been held that an employee does not generally waive his lien by accepting a promissory note without security, unless an intention to waive the lien is otherwise clearly manifested,[69] or by the acceptance and negotiation of a draft where he obtains a return of the draft and offers to surrender it.[70] Filing lien claim under laws relative to mechanic's and materialman's lien has been held not such an abandonment of his claims as will preclude plaintiff from asserting his right to a lien for labor done as provided for by other statutory provisions.[71]

Right to claim waiver. The question whether a claimant has waived his lien by extending the time of payment cannot be raised by one who has not shown by his pleading or in the evidence any right or title to the property in question.[72]

state commerce of certain products and commodities produced in the United States under labor conditions with respect to wages and hours which fail to conform to standards set up by the statute.[75] It prevents the use of interstate commerce as the means of competition in the distribution of goods so produced and as the means of spreading and perpetuating such substandard labor conditions among the workers of the several states.[76] The statute also sets up an administrative procedure whereby those standards may from time to time be modified generally as to industries subject to the statute or within an industry, in accordance with specified standards, by an administrator acting in collaboration with "industry committees" appointed by him.[77] The statute was written in the interest of the employee[78] and is remedial in nature.[79]

Public policy

The motive and purpose of the provision of the Fair Labor Standards Act, prohibiting the shipment in interstate commerce of goods produced for interstate commerce by employees whose wages and hours of employment do not conform to requirements of the act, is to make effective the congressional conception of "public policy" that interstate commerce should not be made the instrument of competition which is injurious to commerce and to the states from and to which the commerce flows in the distribution of goods produced under substandard labor conditions.—Chapman v. classification is required in the industry, will not give one section of it a competitive advantage over another.[93] It is not the policy to put small concerns out of business but to correct and eliminate designated conditions in particular industries without substantially curtailing employment or earning power.[94] The statute protects employees against extremely low wages and sudden changes therein, and at the same time protects the employer under a plan which would justify him in expecting continuous service and the benefit of experienced and satisfied employees.[95]

Congress intended to achieve a national uniform policy of guaranteeing compensation for all work or employment engaged in by employees covered by the statute,[96] and not to codify or perpetuate those customs and contracts which allowed an employer to claim all of an employee's time while compensating him for only a part of it.[97] The statute is not intended to interfere with methods and practices by which compensation is paid,[98] and its purpose is not to create new wage liabilities, but, where a wage liability exists, to measure it by standards fixed by law.[99] The statutory intent is that both employee bargaining power and the statute shall influence hours of work, but that only employee bargaining power shall influence wages as long as they are equal to or above the statutory minimum.[1]

As a regulation of interstate commerce. The Fair Labor Standards Act is a statute regulating interstate commerce, in a matter of national concern,[2] but its purpose is not so much to regulate interstate commerce as such as it is, through the exercise of legislative power, to prohibit the shipment of goods in interstate commerce if they are produced under substandard labor conditions.[3] It has been held that the statute extends federal control in the field of working conditions throughout the farthest reaches of the channels of interstate commerce,[4] but it is not intended to be coextensive with the limits of the power of congress over commerce[5] and it does not manifest an intent to extend the

Local business

Congress did not, in the enactment of the Fair Labor Standards Act, intend to exert the full measure of regulatory powers of the federal government to merely incidental and negligible transactions or to embrace effects on interstate commerce which are indirect and remote.[6]

The Portal-to-Portal Act of 1947, 29 U.S.C.A. §§ 251–262, to the extent that it purports to modify rights and obligations created by the Fair Labor Standards Act, was designed to promote the public interest by the exercise of a power akin to the police power of a state.[7]

State statutes. Some state statutes provide for a minimum wage scale to be adopted and to be put in effect as regards any "sweatshop occupation," that is, any business or occupation which pays to its employees an unfair and oppressive scale of wage.[8] The purpose of such a statute is to protect employees against oppression by their employers in paying them too small a wage.[9]

§ 151(2). Validity

Generally congress under its power to regulate interstate commerce may regulate the wages to be paid by employers engaged in such commerce. Some state statutes regulating wages have been held valid but other statutes have been held invalid.

Although it has been broadly stated that congress has no power to fix the price of labor,[10] as a general rule congress under its power to regulate interstate commerce may regulate the wages to be paid by employers engaged in such commerce.[11] Accordingly the Fair Labor Standards Act, 29 U.S. C.A. § 201 et seq, fixing minimum wages and prescribing additional compensation for hours worked in excess of a specified number per week has been held valid,[12] and the Portal-to-Portal Pay Act of 1947, 29 U.S.C.A. §§ 251–262, to the extent that it its commerce power but instead proposed to leave local business to the protection of the state, thus requiring observation of limitation that courts are not free to absorb by judicial process essentially local activities which congress in the exercise of its judgment did not see fit expressly or by fair implication to bring within scope of the act.—E. C. Schroeder Co. v. Clifton, C.C.A.Okl., 153 F.2d 385, certiorari denied 66 S. Ct. 1351, 1353, 328 U.S. 858, 90 L.Ed. ——, rehearing denied 67 S.Ct. 33, 329 U.S. 821, 91 L.Ed. ——.

modifies rights and obligations created by the Fair Labor Standards Act, has also been held valid.[13] It has also been held, in determining the validity of the Adamson Act of 1916, 39 U.S.St. at L. p 721, that, in an emergency arising from a nation-wide dispute between railroad companies engaged in interstate commerce and their employees over wages, in which a general strike and grave loss and suffering are imminent because the disputants are unable to agree, congress has the power to prescribe a standard of minimum wages not confiscatory in its effects, but obligatory on both parties, to be enforced for a reasonable time.[14]

Numerous decisions have sustained the validity of particular provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act, as with respect to exemption of certain employees,[15] conferment of certain powers on the administrator of the wages and hours division,[16] requiring employers engaged in interstate commerce to keep records of employees and of wages and hours of employment,[17] fixing the terms on which overtime may be worked,[18] and authorizing the recovery of liquidated damages and attorney's fees.[19] It has been held that claims for minimum wages, overtime compensation, liquidated damages, and penalties under the Fair Labor Standards Act are not vested property rights within the protection of the constitution, but that they are simply statutory rights and may be withdrawn by congress at any time before ripening into final judgment.[20]

Provisions of the Bituminous Coal Conservation Act of 1935, 15 U.S.C.A. § 808 (g), delegating the power to fix minimum wages to part of the producers and miners of coal and in effect subjecting the dissenting minority to the will of the majority in respect of wages have been held invalid.[23]

National Industrial Recovery Act. The provisions of the National Industrial Recovery Act § 1 et seq, 15 U.S.C.A. § 701 et seq, were held invalid as far as they attempted to regulate the fixing of wages.[24]

State statutes. It has been held that the state's power does not extend generally to the regulation of wages,[25] and statutes fixing the wages of certain trades, such as barbering,[26] or requiring the payment of time and a half to employees working seven days in any work week, but exempting hotels and their dining rooms from the operation thereof,[27] have been held invalid. However, it has also been held that it is within the legislative power to establish minimum wages, to the extent necessary to protect the health or morals of employees,[28] and to confer on an administrative body the power to investigate labor conditions and to fix a minimum wage and the industries to which such wage shall be applicable.[29]

jectives[31] and in accordance with its obvious intent and purpose.[32] In construing the statute the congressional findings and declaration of policy as set forth in its provisions must be examined with care,[33] and arguments founded on common experience furnishing the motive of congress for the legislation may be material.[34] In situations not precisely covered by the language of the statute, its legislative history as well as all the facts and circumstances should be examined to determine its applicability.[35]

It has been held that the meaning of the statute must in the first instance at least be sought in its language, and if that is plain the sole function of the court is to enforce it,[36] but it has also been held that the intent of the statute should be given effect as against mere words when mere words, construed alone, would produce legislative or judicial brigandage.[37] The words used in the statute should not be given a strained or unreasonable meaning,[38] and the statute should be interpreted to enable the administrator to carry out its provisions consistent with the constitution and accepted rules of construction.[39] The definitions contained in the act are controlling on the courts.[40]

Construction of regulations. Regulations promulgated to effectuate the act should be liberally construed to carry out the purposes of the act.[41] Where the administrator has not assigned a definite meaning to particular words and terms in regulations promulgated by him, the court must assume that such particular words or terms are to be given their ordinarily understood meaning.[42] In determining the intent and scope of orders of the administrator, his interpretive rulings are entitled to great weight and must be viewed from the standpoint of administrative convenience.[43]

tor of the wage and hour division has no authority to fix the date on which the statute shall apply to a certain industry.[45]

Territorial application. The statute is confined in application to the territorial limits of the United States, its territories, and possessions, and has no application to work performed in a foreign country.[46]

Amendment and repeal. It has been held that the Federal Eight-Hour Law amendment of 1940 limiting employment at basic pay to eight hours per day did not repeal the provision of the Fair Labor Standards Act limiting employment at basic pay to forty hours per week.[47]

§ 151(4). Existence of Employment Relationship

a. In general
b. Who are employers
c. Who are employees

a. In General

Generally the Fair Labor Standards Act applies only to persons who stand in the relationship of employer and employee, and in this respect the common-law tests of employment are not of controlling significance and the act may apply to persons and working relationships which prior to the act were not deemed to fall within the employer-employee category.

As a general rule the Fair Labor Standards Act § 1 et seq, 29 U.S.C.A. § 201 et seq, applies only to persons who stand in the relationship of employer and employee.[48] A contract of employment, express or implied, is a prerequisite to the right to wages, to which the protection of the statute applies.[49] Only "employers" are bound by the requirements of the act[50] and only "employees" may claim wages in accordance therewith.[51]

In determining employee rights under the Fair Labor Standards Act, the common-law tests of employment[52] or employer-employee classifications under other statutes[53] are not of controlling significance, since the act contains its own definitions, comprehensive enough to require its application to many persons and working relationships which pri-

Leased bases

The federal Fair Labor Standards Act applies in naval and air bases leased to United States by Great Britain, and an American employer, by operating in such places, does not rid himself of obligation imposed on him by such act to pay overtime wages to his employees.—Eckert v. Hiring by another

If third person acted as agent or employee of paper company in hiring fifty men to cut and deliver pulp wood to paper company, paper company and not third person was "employer" of fifty men within the act and was responsible for wages to be paid such men, but if third person was in fact the employer of such men and company did not join third person in contracting with such men, third person acted independently of company and alone was responsible for failure to carry out provisions of such act relating to minimum wages and maximum hours.—Maddox v. Jones, D.C.Ala., 42 F.Supp. 35.

Manager of corporation

Plaintiffs could not recover money paid to them as overtime compensation pursuant to the act and alleged to have been returned to defendants as a condition of employment against both corporate defendant and individual defendant, who was alleged to be principal stockholder and manager of corporate defendant, or against individual defendant if he was not plaintiffs' employer.—Anderko v. Courtland Handbag Co., D.C.N.J., 53 F.Supp. 140.

Trustee, who together with co-trustees was legal owner as tenants in common of building was not liable as trustee for liquidated damages allowed employees of building under the act after the termination of the trust after which he acted as attorney and agent for owners and made payment to employees on that basis.—Fleming v. Tort

(1) The test for determining employer-employee relationship in cases involving liability in damages for tort is not necessarily decisive in determining such relationship under Fair Labor Standards Act which concerns itself with correction of economic evils through remedies which were unknown at common law.—Walling v. Rutherford Food Corp., C.C.A.Kan., 156 F.2d 513—Walling v. Jacksonville Terminal Co., C.C.A. Fla., 148 F.2d 768.

(2) The applicability of the Fair Labor Standards Act must be judged from the purposes that congress had in mind rather than from the common-law rules worked out for determining tort liability.—Blankenship v. W. U. Tel. Co., C.C.A.W.Va., 161 F.2d 168.

or to the act were not deemed to fall within the employer-employee category.[54] It has been held that whether an employer-employee relationship exists within the statute must be determined entirely by reference to the terms, history, and purposes of the legislation,[55] and that, if the act expressly or by necessary implication brings within its scope certain workers, the court is not concerned with the question whether a master-servant relationship exists under common-law rules.[56] In other words, the applicability of the statute is to be determined by the underlying economic facts concerning the employment of an employee, and not by the niceties of legal classifications.[57]

The existence of the employment relationship depends on the realities of the case, rather than on the language appearing in contracts,[58] and the real nature and characteristic features of the relationship are determinative, rather than the mere name attributed to it by the parties.[59] On the other hand, a few decisions have held that the statute does not abrogate the usual and accepted concepts of the employer and employee relationship, either in letter or in spirit, but that the substantive law remains unimpaired.[60]

It has been held that the proprietors and employees of a business may contract to continue the business as a partnership in which all are members, thus dispensing with any employer-employee relationship, and that such an arrangement is not illegal notwithstanding it is entered into with the avowed intention of avoiding the impact of the act on the business.[61] It has also been held, however, that, where an employer reorganizes the business into a coöperative, whether an employer-employee relationship still exists for purposes of the Fair Labor Standards Act depends on whether the business is controlled by the member-workers or the former employer,[62] and, where the former employer still retains control, he is liable under the act as an employer regardless of the fact that the method of payment of workers has been changed so that their compensation consists of a share of the profits.[63]

b. Who Are Employers

The term "employer" as used in the Fair Labor Standards Act is given a broad meaning to carry out the declared purpose of the act and is not limited to the narrow conception of principal and agent or master and servant.

In doubtful situations, coverage under Fair Labor Standards Act is to be determined broadly by reference to underlying economic realities rather than by traditional rules governing legal classifications of master and servant on one hand, and employer and independent contractor on the other.—Walling v. The statutory definitions of "employer," "employee," and "employ" are in very general terms, and should be understood in their natural sense, and intended to describe the conventional relations of employer and employee.—Dugas v. Nashua Mfg. Co., D.C.N.H., 62 F.Supp. 846, appeal dismissed, C.C.A., 154 F.2d 655—Schroepfer v. A. S. Abell Co., D.C. State law

Whether a former employee was an independent contractor and the employer of workmen claiming benefits of Fair Labor Standards Act, or merely an employee of alleged employer, depended on state law as it existed before enactment of Fair Labor Standards Act.—Brown v. Minngas Co., D.C.Minn., 51 F.Supp. 363.

Participation in organization

Although fact that former employer actively participated in organizing co-operative among employees to avoid the Fair Labor Standards Act was not an element bringing him within scope of the act, his motive had some probative value on issue of whether co-operative was controlled by member-workers or by former employer.—Fleming v. Palmer, C.C.A.Puerto Rico, 123 F.2d 749, certiorari denied Caribbean Embroidery Co-op v. Fleming, 62 S.Ct. 942, 316 U.S. 662, 86 L.Ed. 1739.

correlative of "employee,"[65] and may be defined as one who employs, or one who uses or engages the services of other persons for pay.[66] Under the provisions of § 3 (d) of the act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 203, "employer" includes any person acting directly or indirectly in the interest of an employer with relation to an employee,[67] and accordingly the term "employer" may extend to a managing partner employing workers in the interest of the partnership[68] or to a corporation which controls another, with respect to employees of the latter.[69]

The Fair Labor Standards Act § 3 (e), 29 U.S.C.A. § 203 (e), defines the term "employ" as including to "suffer or permit to work,"[70] and the term "employment" is used as meaning physical or mental exertion controlled or required by the employer, and pursued necessarily or primarily for the employer and his business.[71] Accordingly one may be an employer if he permits another to work for him, although he has not expressly hired or employed him,[72] provided such work is done with the knowledge of the employer,[73] and persons who are in reality employees are relieved of the necessity of proving a contract of employment.[74] However, the definition is not to be literally construed as imposing the status of an employer on every person who suffers or permits another to work,[75] and if one has not hired another expressly, or suffered nor permitted him to work under circumstances where an

Labor union

(1) If check weighman was employed at agreed daily wage by local union at mine to see that coal mined by union's members was correctly weighed and each coal digger given proper credit for the coal which such digger mined and loaded, relation of employer and employee existed between union and weighman, and parties were covered by the Fair Labor Standards Act.—Williams v. United Mine Workers of America, 172 S.W.2d 202, 294 Ky. 520, 149 A.L.R. 505.

(2) Under statutory definition of "employer" which specifically excluded labor organizations, labor union could not be considered an employer so as to be subject to injunctive provisions of Fair Labor Standards Act available against employers by reason of definition of "person" as including an organized group of persons and definition of "employer" as including any person, and hence action to enjoin labor union and employer from conspiring to force complainant to withdraw another action against employer for overtime wages was required to be dismissed as against union.—Bowe v. Intent of provision

In defining term "employ" in Fair Labor Standards Act as to suffer or permit to work, congress intended to hold every manufacturer engaged in interstate commerce responsible for connivance or collusion with anyone who assumes status of independent contractor, when in fact such individual was merely agent or servant or employee of manufacturer, and to protect employee against anyone whose real status in bringing about a contractual relationship in employment is not bona fide.—Dugas v. So one is not an employer who merely "permits" another to work for a third person or the worker's own self,[77] as in the case of persons working as independent contractors,[78] or as employees of an independent contractor,[79] notwithstanding the work done under the contract is for the ultimate benefit and use of the contractee.[80] However, one may not evade the statute by colluding with a third person to interpose such person as an apparent independent contractor to perform services for the real employer, and the third person will be deemed the employer's agent to hire and pay workers for the employer.[81] Guards and watchmen furnished by an independent contractor have been held not employees of the person for whom they perform services,[82] but it has also been held that if they are compensated by the person benefiting by their services they are employees within the act notwithstanding they also have the status of police officers.[83]

In determining by whom an employee is employed, the court must consider the contract of employment, who has direction and control over the employee, who actually pays his wages or salary, and who has the power to hire or fire.[84] The criterion applied in some cases is whose work is being

The term "employee" is defined in the Fair Labor Standards Act as including any individual employed by an employer, and the time or mode of compensation does not control the determination of whether one is an employee within the act.

Under the Fair Labor Standards Act § 3 (e), 29 U.S.C.A. § 203 (e), the term "employee" is defined as including any individual employed by an employer.[86] The time or mode of compensation does not control the determination of whether one is an employee within the act,[87] and persons may be employees whether compensated by a unit of time, by the piece, or by any other measurement.[88] Accordingly, porters serving in railroad terminals may be employees of the railroad terminal company although they receive their compensation from tips given by persons for whom they provide services.[89]

The status of one as an employee generally depends on whether the alleged employer has expressly or impliedly agreed to pay a certain sum of money to the employee, and has the control and determination of the hours of work by the employee.[90] The statute does not stamp all persons as employees who, without any express or implied compensation agreement, might work for their own advantage on the premises of another,[91] and accordingly a person whose work serves only his own interest is not an employee of another person who gives him aid and instruction.[92] On the other hand, if the economic realities reveal that a person performs services for another, which are an integral and necessary part of the latter's interstate business, the person so rendering such service is an employee within the meaning of the statute, regardless of the contract terms under which such services are rendered.[93]

An officer whose duties are executive or supervisory, whose hours of work are not regulated or controlled, and whose compensation is not dependent on hours or any other measure of time actually devoted to his duties is not an employee within the contemplation of a state minimum wage act; but one who, although nominally a corporate officer, performs duties and receives compensation on a basis which, apart from his holding of his office, would place him in the category of an employee as generally understood is within the statute.[94]

Independent contractors. As a general rule persons who are independent contractors and not employees of another are not within the coverage of the Fair Labor Standards Act.[95] In determining whether one is an employee or an independent contractor under the Fair Labor Standards Act, the common-law standards unrelated to the objectives of the act are irrelevant.[96] Accordingly the fact that a worker stands in a relation to another which, under the common-law aspects of the matter might more easily be called an independent contractor than an employee, does not relieve the other of compliance with the Fair Labor Standards Act if the other suffers or permits such worker to work within the act.[97] Where the work done, in its essence, follows the usual path of an employee, the worker is under the protection of the act although called an independent contractor by the employer,[98] and it is immaterial that the work is performed off the premises of the employer,[99] as in the case of homeworkers.[1]

It has been held, however, that women preparing raw rags for delivery to carpet manufacturing company by ripping, sewing and skeining them at women's homes under contracts requiring women to furnish all thread, needles, and other necessary tools, providing that company should have no control over or right to control women, and obligating it to pay them for skeined rags by weight on delivery thereof to company, without fixing time therefor or hours of work, or requiring women to do work themselves, were

§ 151(5). Employments Included Generally

The Fair Labor Standards Act was intended to have a broad and comprehensive coverage, and generally applies to all employees engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce other than those specifically excepted.

The Fair Labor Standards Act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 201 et seq, was intended by congress to have a broad and comprehensive coverage,[2] subject to the exemptions provided for by particular provisions, as discussed infra §§ 151 (11)–151 (23). The statute includes all employees engaged in interstate commerce or in the production of goods for such commerce, other than those specifically excepted,[3] and, when not expressly excepted, an employer of such an employee is bound by, and required to comply with, the terms of the act.[4] So it has been held that the courts must assume that all employees in interstate commerce, as far as reasonably possible, are subject to the provisions of the act.[5] In considering the application of the act to a specific state of facts, no abstract formula can be applied, and general propositions are of little aid in determining the boundaries between what is covered by the federal legislation and what congress intended to be left to the states, but the task is one of accommodation.[6] The scope of the statute as respects application to particular employees must be defined in the gradual process of inclusion and exclusion as applied to the facts of particular cases.[7]

In determining whether employees are covered by the act, it is immaterial whether they are compensated by a unit of time, by the piece, or by any other measurement, but such mode of compensation must be translated or reduced by computation to an hourly basis for the sole purpose of determining whether the statutory requirements as to wages have been fulfilled.[8] So the act applies to workmen employed at a weekly wage as well as to those employed at an hourly wage.[9] The statute is not limited in its effect to employees receiving less than the minimum wage prescribed by its provisions,[10] and employees are not to be deprived of the benefits of the act simply because they are well paid or because they are represented by strong bargaining agents.[11] The act is available for unorganized workmen as well as organized workmen.[12]

In determining whether the statute is applicable, each individual employee's status must be considered separately, and, where the employer is engaged in different types of business, careful consideration must be given to the employer's various business activities.[13] The statute may be applied to a separate department of an employer's business, although another part is exempt,[14] and some employees in a business enterprise may be covered by the act and others not.[15] An employee engaged in the performance of both covered and noncovered work during the same work week must be compensated for all his work during the week in accordance with the standards prescribed by the act.[16]

The ultimate issue of coverage under the statute is a judicial question committed to the courts,[17] and the question whether a particular employer is covered by the act may be the subject of a judicial determination in appropriate proceedings instituted under the act.[18] An employer may be required to comply with the wage order applicable to a particular industry where his business comes within the definition of such industry,[19] and he may not claim that certain employees covered by the act do not come within the code for a certain industry on the ground that no representative of the particular industry was selected on the board charged with administration since it is not neecssary that representation be given to every specialized branch of industry.[20] Under the statute an employer at its peril must decide which employees are covered by the act, and comply with its requirements as to such employees,[21] but it has been held, where a doubt exists as to whether the act applies to a particular employee, that the court will not place a greater burden on the employer than is necessary in order to comply with the mandates of the act.[22] Unless the type of work involved is covered by the act the court cannot grant relief against inadequate pay.[23]

Adamson Act. The Adamson Act of 1916, 39 U.S.St. at L. p 721, fixing a standard of wages for certain employees of railroad companies, was held applicable only to trainmen working on engines or in cars and not to switchmen.[24]

§ 151(6). Employment in Interstate Commerce

The Fair Labor Standards Act generally concerns itself with employments involved in interstate commerce or in the production of goods for commerce.

The Fair Labor Standards Act § 1 et seq, 29 U.S.C.A. § 201 et seq, concerns itself with employments involved in interstate commerce or in the production of goods for commerce,[25] and generally its operation extends to all employers who are "engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce."[26] However, the statute does not extend its coverage over the entire field of interstate commerce ordinarily subject to federal control,[27] and it does not regulate local transactions which merely affect interstate commerce.[28] So it has been broadly held that the act is confined in application to employers engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce within the scope of those activities as expressed in the law.[29] It has been held, however, that the requirement of the statute that "every employer" pay wages at a specified rate to each employee who is engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce is all-embracing and includes within its scope employers whose business is not in commerce and who produce nothing for commerce,[30] and, as discussed infra § 151 (9), the applicability of the statute generally depends on the character of the work performed by the employee, rather than on the character of the employer's business. Accordingly, whether an employer is governed by the act depends in the final analysis on the degree to which the services of its employees affect interstate commerce.[31]

In determining whether an employer is engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce, each transaction and business must be examined in the light of all surrounding circumstances,[32] and the special facts pertaining to the particular business are controlling.[33] The fact that some of the customers to which an employer ministered were engaged in interstate commerce does not establish that the employer is engaged in such commerce where none of the customers either sold what was received from the employer or produced with what it received any significant part for commerce that could be credited to any particular portion of the labor of the employer's employees.[34] Whether an apparently local transaction takes place at the beginning or at the end of interstate commerce is immaterial on the question whether an employer is engaged in interstate commerce within the statute.[35]

§ 151(7). —— What Constitutes Commerce, Engagement in Commerce, and Production for Commerce

a. In general
b. Production of goods for commerce
c. Particular businesses and industries

a. In General

The word "commerce" as used in provisions of the statute extending coverage to employers and employees engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce means trade, commerce, transportation, or communication from any state to any place outside thereof; and generally the engagement in any one of the activities which are included in the statutory definition is sufficient to subject an employer to regulation under the act.

The word "commerce" as used in provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act § 1 et seq, 29 U.S.C.A. § 201 et seq, extending coverage of the act to employers and employees engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce is defined by § 3 (b) of the act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 203 (b), as trade, commerce, transportation, transmission, or communication among the several states or from any state to any place outside thereof.[36] The word "commerce" thus means "interstate commerce,"[37] and includes such transactions, conditions, and relationships as had theretofore been known and acknowledged as constituting interstate commerce in the constitutional sense.[38] The term includes more than transportation, and embraces all component parts of commercial intercourse among states;[39] it comprehends not only shipments but also carriers engaged in interstate commerce and the instrumentalities by which such commerce is carried on.[40]

In determining what constitutes "commerce" or "engaged in commerce" within the Fair Labor Standards Act, the courts are guided by practical considerations,[41] and it has been held that they will liberally construe the statutory language and not restrict the operation of the statute by technical interpretations of the term "commerce."[42] The words "engaged in commerce" should not be so limited by construction as to defeat the purpose of congress, but should be interpreted in a manner consistent with their practical meaning and effect in the particular situation.[43] The term "transportation" as used in the statutory definition of "commerce" is not restricted to its technical meaning as the carrying of a shipment from consignor to consignee, but is used in its general sense as well understood and legally defined in other instances and situations.[44] The transportation need not be in pursuit of trade, and it makes no difference whether the goods handled are personally owned goods of the employer or goods moving interstate for the convenience of the government.[45]

As a general rule the engagement in any one of the activities which are included in the statutory definition of "commerce" is sufficient to subject an employer to regulation under the Fair Labor Standards Act.[46] One who ships goods interstate is engaged in interstate commerce[47] and the unloading at destination of an interstate shipment is also work in interstate commerce within the statute, regardless of whether done by the carrier or another.[48] However, the mere fact that an anticipated local transaction causes a movement in interstate commerce is not sufficient to constitute the local transaction a part of interstate commerce.[49]

processing thereof, and the shipment, or the intention that they be shipped abroad in interstate commerce constitutes one "flow of commerce" with respect to application of the statute.[50] Where orders are solicited within a state and the goods are shipped from without the state directly to the customer or to an agent for delivery to the customer, the transactions are a part of interstate commerce until the goods reach the customer.[51] So also where goods are bought for use beyond state lines and it is understood by both seller and buyer that they are to be promptly transported by the buyer in interstate commerce, the sale of such goods is in itself a part of interstate commerce, notwithstanding the sale and delivery take place entirely within one state.[52]

Where goods once enter the channels of interstate commerce, they thereby acquire an interstate status which continues until the interstate journey ends and they come to rest at the point of their intended destination,[53] and in this respect it has been held that goods do not reach their destination until actually unloaded and deposited in the yards of one ordering the goods from other states, and that neither a switch track nor cars in which the goods are carried are a place of rest or final destination.[54] Goods remain in commerce until they reach their final destination, notwithstanding a halt in their movement, where such halt is a convenient intermediate step in the process of getting them to their final destination.[55] So a mere temporary break in the interstate transportation of goods by placing them in a warehouse waiting final delivery, or a series of deliveries and transmission to and from a place of temporary rest, does not remove goods from commerce within the meaning of the statute.[56] However, where merchandise is delivered from out of the state to the place of business of one engaged strictly in local business, its interstate movement has terminated.[57] So it has been held that intra-state distribution of stock from a warehouse not on prior order or contract is not work in commerce within the meaning of the statute,[58] and

Bulk plants

Where interstate shipments of petroleum products were unloaded at bulk plants of distributor-employer, and such products were transported in commerce to the bulk plants with intention, in advance of transportation, that all of products except incidental sales would go to retail service stations, temporary storage of products in tanks at bulk plants was merely a convenient intermediate step in process of getting them to their final destination, and hence employee, whose duties consisted of inspecting and keeping in repair the bulk plants, was engaged in commerce within statute.—Mid-Continent Petroleum Corp. v. Test

In determining whether sales made by factor or agent of an out-of-state principal from stock of goods in warehouse is interstate commerce, the test is whether the interstate journey has, in good faith, come to an end before the sale is made.—Lorber v. Rosow, D.C.Conn., 58 F.Supp. 341.

If there is a practical continuity of movement from the manufacturers or suppliers without the state through a wholesale distributor's warehouse and on to customers whose prior orders or contracts are being filled, the interstate journey is not ended by reason of a temporary holding of the goods in the warehouse of the wholesaler.—Walling v. that the fact that part of the employer's merchandise, after being brought to the employer's place of business from outside the state, ultimately reached consumers and retailers unchanged in form did not constitute such continuity of flow of those products in interstate commerce as would bring employees within the statute.[59]

Manufacturing. Although the manufacture or processing of goods is not in and of itself commerce within the meaning of the Fair Labor Standards Act,[60] the shipment of manufactured goods interstate is such commerce,[61] and the statute also extends to the producer of goods who has knowledge that the sale, shipment, or delivery of the goods in commerce is intended.[62]

Instrumentalities of commerce. Persons engaged in maintaining, repairing, and operating facilities constituting instrumentalities of commerce are engaged in commerce within the statute.[63] The work of keeping tracks and bridges used by interstate commerce in a proper state of repair has been held so closely related to such commerce as to be a part thereof.[64]

b. Production of Goods for Commerce

(a) In general
(b) Goods

(a) In General

Under provisions rendering the Fair Labor Standards Act applicable to employers engaged in the production of goods for commerce, the term "produced" means produced, manufactured, mined, handled, or in any other manner worked on in any state.

As discussed supra § 151 (6), the Fair Labor Standards Act § 1 et seq, 29 U.S.C.A. § 201 et seq, generally applies to employers engaged in the production of goods for commerce, and in this connection, § 3 (j) of the act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 203 (j), defines the term "produced" as meaning produced, manufactured, mined, handled, or in any other manner worked on in any state;[65] and an em-

Recurrent orders

Goods delivered pursuant to prior order, contract, or understanding with dealer's customers must be included in the group of transactions held to be in commerce within statute; but fact that most of the customers form a fairly stable group, whose orders are recurrent as to kind and amount of merchandise desired so that manager can estimate with precision the needs of his business, does not necessarily justify the inference that the transaction is in commerce.—Ouendag v. Gibson, D. C.Mich., 49 F.Supp. 379.

Responsibility for movement

Whether a particular manufacturer who is engaged in producing goods which thereafter move in interstate commerce is responsible for such movement, or whether his activities with respect to the goods are completely terminated by delivery of his goods to another in same state who thereafter ships them in interstate commerce either in their original or changed form, has no material bearing on applicability of statute to the manufacturer.—Walling v. Kerr, D.C.Pa., 47 F.Supp. 852.

Independent contractor for rotary drilling operations on oil wells who was not financially interested in wells, but who was closely identified with business of oil production in state, could not escape applicability of Fair Labor Standards Act by claim of ignorance of interstate character of state oil industry.—Warren-Bradshaw Drilling Co. v. Roads and bridges

Fact that owner of toll road and drawbridge might be subject to state taxation did not imply that it was free from federal regulation or that its road and bridge were not instrumentalities of interstate commerce so as to make the statute inapplicable to employees maintaining and operating road and bridge.—Overstreet v. North Shore Corporation, Fla., 63 S.Ct. 494, 318 U.S. 125, 87 L.Ed. 656.

"Production" in an economic sense includes all activity directed to increasing the number of scarce economic goods, and is not simply the manual, physical labor involved in changing the form or utility of a tangible article.—Borden Co. v. Borella, N.Y., 65 S.Ct. 1223, 325 U.S. 679, 89 L.Ed. 1865, 161 A.L.R. 1258.

Tangible goods

The statute is not limited to the producers of tangible goods.—Lenroot v. Western Union Tel. Co., D.

ployee is deemed to be engaged in the production of goods if he is employed in producing, manufacturing, mining, handling, transporting, or in any other manner working on such goods, or in any process or occupation necessary to the production thereof, as is discussed infra § 151 (9) b. It has been held that the term "produced" is used in its ordinary and comprehensive economic sense,[66] but it has also been held that the word as defined has a broader meaning than the one which it has in ordinary usage.[67] The terms "handled" and "worked on" as used in the statutory definition are terms of ordinary speech, and mean what they mean in ordinary intercourse.[68]

The phrase "production for commerce" relates to all goods which at the time of production, the employer, according to the normal course of his business, intends or expects to move in interstate commerce,[69] whether they are to be shipped by the maker or by someone else,[70] and it is immaterial that through the exigencies of the business all of the goods may not thereafter actually enter interstate commerce.[71] So the fact that goods produced by an employer are sold, delivered, and paid for in the same state where they are produced does not necssarily remove them from the classification of goods produced for interstate commerce under the statute.[72] The term "production of goods for commerce" also includes the production of goods in view, or to serve as an essential part, of interstate transportation or commerce.[73] Accordingly employees engaged in work on public roads, streets, and bridges used in interstate commerce and indispensable to the continuance of production of goods moving in interstate commerce are engaged in the production of goods for commerce within the coverage of the act.[74]

The term "production of goods for commerce" includes all steps, whether or not manufacture, which lead to readiness for putting goods into the stream of commerce, and every kind of incidental operation preparatory to putting goods into the stream of commerce.[75] Where local transportation of goods is a step in putting a product into interstate commerce, such step, however slight, becomes a part of production of goods for commerce within the statute,[76] but the definition of the term "produced" as including the "handling" of goods does not extend to the handling of goods in carriage or transmission in commerce.[77] The fact that the amount of goods destined for commerce is great or small is immaterial.[78]

(b) Goods

Under provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act extending the act to employments concerned with the production of goods for commerce, the term "goods" means wares, products, commodities, merchandise, or articles or subjects of commerce of any character, or any part or ingredient thereof.

The term "goods" as used in provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act § 1 et seq, 29 U.S.C.A. § 201 et seq, rendering the act applicable to employers and employees engaged in the "production of goods for commerce" is defined in § 3 (i) of the act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 203 (i), as meaning goods, wares, products, commodities, merchandise, or articles or subjects of commerce of any character, or any part or ingredient thereof.[79] Accordingly the word has been held to mean commodities which are sent into commerce for trade and traffic in the business world, which will move into commerce and not be consumed by those engaged in such commerce.[80] Where goods play an all-important part in carrying on interstate shipments, competition of goods produced in one state with goods manufactured in another is not necessarily the sole test of whether

A corporate interstate wholesaler and jobber of textile trimmings which were sometimes broken up and wound on cards by machines as means of selling smaller quantities, but material in which left premises in same condition as when received, handled them merely as distributor or transporter and was not engaged in production of goods for interstate commerce within statute.—Quest v. George A. Bowman, Inc., 64 N.Y.S.2d 60.

Products held "goods"

(1) Barges used in interstate commerce.—Slover v. Wathen, C.C.A. Md., 140 F.2d 258.

(2) Crude oil.—Divine v. Levy, D. C.La., 39 F.Supp. 44.

(3) Gold mined for the government.—Walling v. Haile Gold Mines, C.C.A.S.C., 136 F.2d 102.

(4) Ice.—Chapman v. Home Ice Co., C.C.A.Tenn., 136 F.2d 353, certiorari denied 64 S.Ct. 72, 320 U.S. 761, 88 L.Ed. 454—Atlantic Co. v. Walling, C.C.A.Ga., 131 F.2d 518—Wagner v. American Service Co., D. C.Iowa, 58 F.Supp. 32—Gordon v. Paducah Ice Mfg. Co., D.C.Ky., 41 F.Supp. 980.

(5) Passenger automobiles converted to buses.—Walling v. Armbruster, D.C.Ark., 51 F.Supp. 166.

"Articles of commerce"

(1) Sample books distributed free of charge to prospective customers as a means of furthering interstate sales and shipments of materials displayed therein would be deemed articles of commerce, and hence goods, rendering manufacturer thereof subject to statute notwithstanding distribution of the books in other states was made without charge.—Walling v. Higgins, D.C. Pa., 47 F.Supp. 856.

(2) Where employer was engaged in the dyeing of yarn for use of manufacturers of carpets and rugs in state, and all of employer's work was done for customers in state who thereafter shipped their carpets and rugs to various points outside of state, rugs and carpets manufactured by employer's customers and shipped interstate were articles of commerce, and employer and his employees were engaged in the production of goods for commerce.—Walling v. Kerr, D.C.Pa., 47 F.Supp. 852.

Levees and ditches

Under this section, "goods" means things which could be created or made, or materials or ingredients for such things, and did not include building levees and irrigation ditches.—Zehring v. Brown Materials, D. C.Cal., 48 F.Supp. 740.

80. Ark.—Couch v. Ward, 168 S.W. 2d 822, 205 Ark. 308.

According to some decisions the term "goods" may include intangibles,[82] but other decisions hold that the statute uses the word as referring to tangible things only.[83] It has been held that the term "goods" includes bonds, shares of stock, commercial paper, bills of lading and the like,[84] telegraphic messages,[85] and correspondence, reports, and other documents;[86] but it has also been held that money[87] and letters or papers having no value except as records[88] are not "goods."

The statute expressly provides that the term "goods" does not include goods after their delivery into the physical possession of the ultimate consumer thereof other than a producer, manufacturer, or processor thereof.[89] The exclusion clause applies only to goods which, having come into the hands of the ultimate consumer, have been withdrawn from further traffic and sale, so that interstate transportation of the goods may take place without responsibility for a prior production in violation of standards imposed by the act;[90] it does not relate to goods considered with reference to production[91] and does not apply to goods in the course of production.[92]

c. Particular Businesses and Industries

Generally all businesses and industries "engaged in commerce" or in the "production of goods for commerce" within the meaning of those terms as used in the statute are subject to the regulations of the statute unless specifically exempted therefrom.

As a general rule, all businesses and industries "engaged in commerce" or in the "production of goods for commerce" within the meaning of those terms as used in the Fair Labor Standards Act § 1 et seq, 29 U.S.C.A. § 201 et seq, are subject to the regulations of the act unless specifically exempted therefrom.[93] Thus if the requisite connection with

Atlantic Co., D.C.Ga., 40 F.Supp. 654, affirmed, C.C.A., 131 F.2d 518.

"Ultimate consumer"

(1) A paper manufacturer which bought pulpwood from producers paying substandard wages, used pulpwood to manufacture paper, and shipped paper in interstate commerce, was not ultimate consumer of the pulpwood within provision of the Fair Labor Standards Act that "goods" does not include goods after their delivery into actual physical possession of ultimate consumer.—Southern Advance Bag & Paper Co. v. U. S., C.C.A.La., 133 F.2d 449.

(2) Building contractor was ultimate consumer of building materials obtained from outside the state rather than a producer, manufacturer or processor thereof within provision of statute defining "goods" as not including goods after delivery into actual physical possession of ultimate consumer.—Barbe v. Cummins Const. Co., D.C.Md., 49 F.Supp. 168, affirmed, C.C.A., 138 F.2d 667.

Delivery

Under the Fair Labor Standards Act provision that "goods" does not include goods after delivery into physical possession of ultimate consumer other than a producer, manufacturer or processor, the delivery contemplated is one that gives the ultimate consumer the right to deal with the goods as his own while they are being consumed.—Phillips v. Star Overall Dry Cleaning Laundry Co., C.C.A.N.Y., 149 F.2d 416, certiorari denied All Service Laundry Corp. v. Phillips, 66 S.Ct. 677, 327 U.S. 780, 90 L.Ed. 1008, rehearing denied 66 S.Ct. 815, 327 U.S. 817, 90 L.Ed. 1040.

Assumption as to further commerce

The exclusion from definition of "goods" in Fair Labor Standards Act of goods after delivery to possession of ultimate consumer other than producer, manufacturer or processor, is for the benefit of the ultimate consumer on assumption that ultimate consumer will not participate further in interstate commerce.—Fleming v. Atlantic Co., D. C.Ga., 40 F.Supp. 654, affirmed, C.C. A., Atlantic Co. v. Walling, 131 F. 2d 518.

91. U.S.—Fleming v. Atlantic Co., D.C.Ga., 40 F.Supp. 654, affirmed, C.C.A., Atlantic Co. v. Walling, 131 F.2d 518.

Ice consumed by purchasers

Ice furnished by employer for interstate railroad, express, and trucks for refrigeration of interstate freight shipments was not outside the statutory definition of goods although it was consumed by purchasers.—Chapman v. Home Ice Co., C.C.A.Tenn., 136 F.2d 353, certiorari denied 64 S.Ct. 72, 320 U.S. 761, 88 L.Ed. 454—Atlantic Co. v. Walling, C.C.A.Ga., 131 F.2d 518—Hamlet Ice Co. v. A large metropolitan newspaper publishing company was engaged in interstate commerce within the statute with respect to publication of duction and distribution,[8] scrap metal operations,[9] transportation,[10] warehousing and storing,[11] and other miscellaneous businesses.[12] The statute has been held to apply to employers engaged in work under government contract where such work involves commerce.[13]

Building and construction work. Employers engaged in the original construction of buildings are not generally within the scope of the Fair Labor Standards Act, even though the buildings, when completed, will be used to produce goods for commerce.[14] However, where the construction constitutes an integral part of existing plants and its purpose is to continue the operation of the plants, all of which are producing goods for commerce, the work has been held to be within the statute.[15] Similarly it has been held that new construction of telephone and railroad facilities constituting instrumentalities of interstate commerce,[16] and of roads, streets, and bridges to be used in interstate commerce and indispensable to the continuance of production of goods moving in interstate commerce,[17] constitutes an activity covered by the Fair Labor Standards Act. According to other decisions, however, a construction company engaged in the construction of highways, railroads, and bridges does not come within the purview of the act,[18] and a highway constructed on a site where no highway existed before is not an instrumentality of interstate commerce until actually used to carry interstate traffic, so that work performed in the construction thereof is not employment in commerce within the statute.[19] It has also been held that work in digging levees and irrigation ditches for a purely local irrigation project is not work in commerce.[20]

Wholesale and retail distributors. As a general rule, a wholesaler or retailer engaged solely in in-papers, gathering of news therefor and sale of the papers sent out of the state.—Schroepfer v. A. S. Abell Co., C.C.A.Md., 138 F.2d 111, certiorari denied 64 S.Ct. 486, 321 U.S. 763, 88 L.Ed. 1060, rehearing denied 64 S. Ct. 1149, 322 U.S. 770, 88 L.Ed. 1595.

Distributors of newspapers to street corner vending machines and dealers within the state for local sale were not engaged in interstate commerce within statute on theory that distributors' service was merely a part of publisher's whole enterprise of interstate gathering and distribution of news.—Schroepfer v. A. S. Abell Co., C.C.A.Md., 138 F.2d 111, certiorari denied 64 S.Ct. 486, 321 U.S. 763, 88 L.Ed. 1060, rehearing denied 64 S.Ct. 1149, 322 U.S. 770, 88 L.Ed. 1595.

Switching railroad
Where substantial part of tonnage carried by switching railroad serving industrial plants originated at out of state points or was to move to points outside state, railroad was engaged in interstate commerce and was an instrumentality of interstate commerce.—Walling v. McCrady Const. Co., D.C.Pa., 60 F.Supp. 243.

A terminal company, which furnished usual terminal facilities to four railroads regularly engaged in interstate transportation of passengers and freight, was subject to statute.—Walling v. Jacksonville Terminal Co., D.C.Fla., 55 F.Supp. 302, affirmed, C.C.A., 148 F.2d 768.

§ 151(9). —— Employee's Activities as Controlling

a. In general
b. Activities constituting engagement in commerce or production of goods for commerce
c. Work in part in interstate commerce
d. Particular employees

a. In General

Generally, the applicability of the Fair Labor Standards Act depends on the character of the work performed by the employee, rather than on the character of the employer's business, and an employee is not protected by the act unless the nature of his services is such as to constitute engagement in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce.

Under the provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act §§ 6, 7, 29 U.S.C.A. §§ 206, 207, the coverage of the act with respect to minimum wages and overtime pay extends to employees who are "engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce" within the broad scope of those activities expressed in the law.[38] The applicability of the act thus depends on the character of the work performed by the employee, rather than on the character of the employer's business,[39] and the duties of ber were received in intra-state commerce, fact that a few shipments constituting less than one half of one per cent of jobber's purchases were made in interstate commerce would not bring jobber's business under the statute since maxim, De minimis non curat lex, applied.—Daly v. each employee must be looked to in order to ascertain whether a substantial part of his labor is in "commerce," in the "production of goods for commerce," or in an "occupation necessary to production" of such goods so as to entitle him to the benefits of the act.[40] However, in order to classify the activities of the employee, it is necessary also to consider the activities of the employer by whom he is engaged.[41]

The statute has been held to apply to all persons employed in connection with commerce or in the production of goods for commerce without regard to the nature of the employer's business,[42] and it has been held that employees may be within the act, although the employer's entire business is not interstate in character,[43] or although the employer is primarily engaged in intra-state business[44] and his interstate transactions are merely incidental to the intra-state business,[45] or although the employer is not engaged in commerce.[46] According to other decisions, however, an employee is not "engaged in commerce" or "production of goods for commerce"

Short-line railroad

Determination that employees of railroad operating short line railroad were engaged in interstate commerce and in production of goods for commerce within Fair Labor Standards Act were not inconsistent with determination that employer was not entitled to exemption from overtime provisions on theory that it was subject to the Interstate Commerce Act.—Rockton & R. Special facts

The coverage of Fair Labor Standards Act depends on special facts pertaining to particular business.—Baum v. A. C. Office Bldg. Co., 143 P.2d 417, 157 Kan. 558, 150 A.L.R. 581.

Maintenance services

Where maintenance company contracted with banks to furnish banks all janitorial services and equipment on flat monthly basis and pursuant to its contract employed and paid janitors to work at banks, the fact that the maintenance company did a purely intrastate business, and that the janitors were not employed by the banks did not of itself bar the janitors from benefits of the act.—Lorenzetti v. so as to be entitled to coverage under the act unless the employer is so engaged,[47] although in any event, to the extent that employees are "engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce," the employer is himself so engaged.[48]

The act does not make complete coverage of all employees connected in any way with interstate transportation.[49] In order that an employee may be within the act, the nature of his services must be such as to constitute engagement in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce,[50] and employees engaged in occupations which merely affect or indirectly relate to commerce are not within the act.[51] The mere fact that the employer is engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce does not establish that his employees are covered by the statute as engaged in work within the scope of the act.[52] Some employees may be en-

b. Activities Constituting Engagement in Commerce or Production of Goods for Commerce

(a) In general
(b) Production of goods for commerce

(a) In General

Generally, there is no fixed formula by which it may be ascertained whether an employee is engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce within the provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act, but the decision in each case must turn on the attendant facts.

It has been said that there is no fixed formula by which the courts can ascertain whether an employee is "engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce" within the provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 201 et seq, but the decision in each case must turn on the attendant facts.[54] The phrases "engaged in commerce" or in the "production of goods for commerce" are not synonymous but supplementary to each other; they were deliberately chosen as appropriate language to delineate entirely different fields of coverage under the act.[55] Congress intended by the last-quoted phrase to embrace a wider field of activities than by the use of the first-quoted phrase,[56] and the test as to whether an employee is engaged in commerce is somewhat more exacting than the test as to whether his occupation is necessary to production of goods for commerce.[57]

In determining the question whether an employee is "engaged in commerce" within the act, the courts are generally guided by practical considerations.[58] The test usually applied is whether the employee is actually engaged in the movement of commerce, or whether the services he performs are so closely related thereto as to be, for all practical purposes, an essential part thereof.[59] In this connection "close-

Spasmodic activity

Where employee was superintendent of employer's retail system for delivery of ice and coal and occasionally employee participated in icing of railroad refrigerator cars and freight trucks moving in interstate commerce, but such participation was of an occasional spasmodic nature and not a part of his regular duties, and employee's participation in such work was contrary to orders of management, the employee was not within the act.—Bohn v. Factual basis

Congress, in providing that employees engaged in work necessary to production of goods for commerce should be within statute, indicated that factual basis is less rigid for such a relationship than that which would be required in order to justify a finding that employee was engaged in commerce.—Phillips v. ness" depends on the essentiality and indispensability of the particular work or services performed to the actual movement of commerce,[60] and, if a cessation of the services of the employee causes an interruption or interference with the free movement of commerce, it is ordinarily regarded as an essential and indispensable part thereof.[61] It is not the volume or percentage of an employee's contribution to the movement of commerce which is the test of whether he is engaged in commerce within the statute, but, if the services he performs are essential to the movement of commerce and not merely sporadic and isolated, he is engaged in commerce.[62]

The phrase "engaged in commerce" covers every employee in the channels of interstate commerce as distinguished from those who merely affect that commerce.[63] Engagement in commerce, within the act, does not include acts merely necessary to such commerce,[64] or work which is purely local in character.[65] Employees are not within the act where their duties have no relation to the movements of goods in interstate commerce, that is, where they are not so intimately connected with the interstate movement of supplies and materials as to be, in legal contemplation, a part thereof.[66] On the other hand, any employee of an owner or operator of direct instrumentalities of interstate transportation whose task is immediately connected with maintaining them or keeping them in condition for and during such use must be regarded as being "engaged in commerce."[67]

The test in determining the question whether an employee who crosses state lines is engaged in interstate commerce is what activities the employee was engaged in after he crossed the state line, unless he was transporting goods across the state line.[68] All persons are engaged in interstate commerce who contribute labor to assist in the movement of a commodity designated for an interstate journey from the time it leaves the depository of the actual consignor until the time it reaches the depository of the ultimate consignee, even though the commodity might pause in transit.[69] So, employees engaged in the unloading at destination of an interstate shipment are "engaged in commerce."[70] However, an employee is not engaged in commerce with respect to activities in connection with goods after their interstate movement has ceased and they have come to rest within a state.[71] The act does not intend to exempt from its coverage employees whose activities relate to movement in interstate commerce of personally owned goods of the employer or goods moving interstate for the convenience of the United States government.[72]

(b) Production of Goods for Commerce

An employee is deemed to be engaged in the production of goods for commerce and hence within the coverage of the Fair Labor Standards Act if he is employed in producing, manufacturing, mining, handling, transporting, or in any other manner working on goods intended for interstate commerce, or in any process or occupation necessary to the production thereof.

Under the provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act § 3 (j), 29 U.S.C.A. § 203 (j), an employee is deemed to be engaged in the production of goods for commerce if he is employed in producing, manufacturing, mining, handling, transporting, or in any other manner working on such goods, or in any process or occupation necessary to the production thereof,[73] and an employee so engaged is within the

(8) Employees engaged in the maintenance and operation of a telephone line.—Overstreet v. North Shore Corporation, D.C.Fla., 43 F. Supp. 445, affirmed, C.C.A., 128 F.2d 450, reversed on other grounds 63 S. Ct. 494, 318 U.S. 125, 87 L.Ed. 656.

Employees held not engaged in production

(1) Generally.—Crabb v. Weldon Bros., D.C.Iowa, 65 F.Supp. 369—Lynch v. Embry-Riddle Co., D.C.Fla., 63 F.Supp. 992—Kappler v. Republic Picture Corp., D.C.Iowa, 59 F.Supp. 112, affirmed, C.C.A., 151 F.2d 543, 162 A.L.R. 228, affirmed 66 S.Ct. 523, 327 U.S. 757, 90 L.Ed. 991, rehearing denied 66 S.Ct. 807, 327 U.S. 817, 90 L.Ed. 1040—Fitzgerald v. Kroger Grocery & Baking Co., D.C.Kan., 45 F.Supp. 812.

(2) An employee engaged in the state in the generation and transmission of electrical power to customers who utilize such power in part to transmit messages without the state. —Camfield v. West Texas Utilities Co., Tex.Civ.App., 170 S.W.2d 552, error refused.

(3) Where contractors, by contrac-

coverage of the act where the goods so produced are intended for interstate commerce.[74] The term "handling," as used in the statutory definition of "production," has been held to imply an immediate connection with the manufacturer and the manufacturing process,[75] and the term "transporting" has been held to mean only such carriage as the goods undergo within the producer's immediate province.[76]

It has been held that the words "handling and transporting" refer only to goods in the process of production and not to goods after production is completed,[77] and that one whose activities are confined to the movement of goods which have already been produced for interstate commerce is not engaged in the "production of goods for commerce," within the act.[78] However, employees who further the manufacturing process by direct work on goods, even to the point of preparation for shipment, are engaged in the production of goods within the statute,[79] and the statute applies to employees engaged in producing goods which are processed further, or changed as to form by other persons before going into interstate commerce.[80] It has been held that "production of goods for commerce" implies something tangible produced, something that comes into existence which is capable of being made the subject of commerce, and something more than the mere hope of, or attempt at, production.[81]

Under the statutory definition of "production," an employee to be within the coverage of the act need not be directly "engaged in commerce" among the several states,[82] but it is necessary and sufficient that his work be "necessary" to the production of goods for commerce.[83] Accordingly, if the employee's services are useful and essential in a proc-tual arrangement with interstate carrier, furnished meals to maintenance-of-way employees of carrier, contractors' cook employed to prepare and serve the meals was not engaged in "production of goods for commerce" within statute.—McLeod v. Threlkeld, Tex., 63 S.Ct. 1248, 319 U.S. 491, 87 L.Ed. 1538.

74. U.S.—Wagner v. American Service Co., D.C.Iowa, 58 F.Supp. 32.

Intermediary between sale and shipment

The question whether employee is within statute where his work is necessary for production of goods for interstate commerce is not whether goods were transported by employer, but whether goods so manufactured were intended for interstate commerce, and fact that there was an intermediary between sale and shipment is immaterial.—Wagner v. American Service Co., D.C. Iowa, 58 F.Supp. 32.

Part of goods

An employee whose services are necessary to an employer's manufacture and shipment of its goods, a substantial part of which is used in filling orders of extra-state customers, is within the protection of the act, even though at the time of handling the goods the employer expected or intended part of the goods to move in intra-state commerce and part in interstate commerce.—Johnson v. Phillips-Buttorff Mfg. Co., 160 S.W.2d 893, 178 Tenn. 559, certiorari denied Phillips-Buttorff Mfg. Co. v. Johnson, 63 S.Ct. 43, 317 U.S. 648, 87 L.Ed. 521.

75. U.S.—Prescott v. Broadway & Franklin Street Corporation, D.C. N.Y., 57 F.Supp. 272.

Sorting and packaging

(1) It has been held that, where shipping clerk of jobber in converted textiles sold interstate sometimes opened cases of goods and sorted them as to color and pattern and repacked them before shipping, the sorting operation did not constitute "production of goods for commerce" within statute since such sorting did not constitute "handling" within statutory language.—Prescott v. Broadway & Franklin Street Corporation, D.C.N.Y., 57 F.Supp. 272.

(2) It has been held on the other hand that one who packages or labels a product or performs any number of tasks incidental to preparing it for shipment "handles" such product.—Walling v. DeSoto Creamery & Produce Co., D.C.Minn., 51 F.Supp. 938.

Term colored by context

In provision governing occupations "necessary to the production" of goods for commerce, "necessary" is colored by the context not only of the terms of the legislation but of its implications in the relation between state and national authority.—10 East 40th St. Bldg. v. Callus, N.Y., 65 S.Ct. 1227, 325 U.S. 578, 89 L.Ed. 1806, 161 A.L.R. 1263.

Substantially necessary

The statute uses the word "necessary" as connoting at least substantially necessary.—Bartholome v. Baltimore Fire Patrol & Despatch Co. of Baltimore City, D.C.Md., 48 F. Supp. 98.

Essentiality

"Necessary" means essential to a desirable or projected end or condition; not to be dispensed with without loss, damage, inefficiency or the like.—Lyons v. H. K. Ferguson Co., La.App., 16 So.2d 587.

ess or occupation necessary to the production of goods for commerce, it is not requisite to coverage under the act that he participate in the physical process of the making of the goods,[84] or that he come in actual physical contact with the goods produced.[85] The employee need not even be employed in the production of an article which itself becomes the subject of commerce or transportation among the several states;[86] it is sufficient that the occupation be one which is necessary to the production of a part of any other articles or subjects of commerce of any character which are produced for commerce.[87]

The criterion of whether an employee's work is necessary to production is one of degree,[88] and the determination generally depends on the facts peculiar to the particular business or industry involved, and the relationship of the employee to the production to which his activities are claimed to be necessary.[89] The test usually applied is whether the employee's work constitutes a part of the integrated effort by which goods are produced,[90] and whether the employee, in any manner, contributes to the finished product.[91] The test is not the relative importance of the work done by the employee, but the practical necessity of performance of the work to the production of goods.[92] The occupation need not be indispensable to the production under consideration,[93] and, if the work performed is convenient and appropriate, or essential and beneficial, to production, it is "necessary" within the meaning of the act.[94] There may be alternative occupations that could be substituted for it, but it is enough that the one at issue is needed in such production and would, if omitted, handicap the production.[95]

The question whether employees are engaged in work necessary to the production of goods for commerce does not depend on the amount or volume of goods produced for commerce, and it is sufficient that the production is constant and consistent.[96] An occupation is not to be excluded from the provisions of the act merely because it contributes to the economy or to the continuity of pro-

Remoteness

Mere separation of an occupation from the physical process of production will not preclude application of the statute, but the remoteness of the particular occupation from the physical process is relevant.—10 East 40th St. Bldg. v. The provision of the statute indicates intent to include all workers in extensive process of production, and to avoid any effort to exclude from benefits of the chapter labor of the unskilled or those who do not actually operate the machine.—Prescott v. Broadway & Franklin Street Corporation, D.C.N.Y., 57 F.Supp. 272.

Use of independent contractors

The fact that repair and rebuilding of electric motors and repair and installation of electrical wiring might have been obtained from a number of independent contractors did not remove from protection of statute employees of company engaged in such work for customers producing goods for commerce, on theory that employees' work was thereby not necessary to production of goods for commerce.—Walling v. Roland Elec. Co., C.C.A.Md., 146 F.2d 745, affirmed 66 S.Ct. 413, 326 U.S. 657, 90 L.Ed. 383.

duction of goods for commerce rather than to the volume of production.[97] Ordinarily, where the services of employees of a company engaged in interstate commerce are rendered in the course of, and in connection with, and necessary and incidental to, the company's business, such employees will be considered to be engaged in the production of goods for interstate commerce.[98] The administration, management, and control of various physical processes together with accompanying accounting and clerical activities are included in the production of goods for commerce within the statute.[99] On the other hand, where the work of an employee has only a tenuous relation to production and is not in any real sense necessary thereto, the employee is not engaged in the production of goods or in handling or working on goods within the provisions of the act.[1] The fact that merely because an occupation is indispensable in the sense of being included in a long line of causation which brings about a result as finished goods does not bring it within the scope of the Fair Labor Standards Act.[2]

c. Work in Part in Interstate Commerce

It is not necessary to coverage under the Fair Labor Standards Act that an employee devote his entire working time to commerce or to the production of goods for commerce, but it is sufficient and necessary that he be engaged in such work to a substantial extent during the work week for which recovery under the act is sought.

An employee, in order to be entitled to the benefits of the Fair Labor Standards Act § 1 et seq, 29 U.S.C.A. § 201 et seq, need not devote his entire working time to "commerce,"[3] or to the "production of goods for commerce,"[4] but it is necessary[5] and sufficient[6] to coverage under the act that he be engaged in interstate commerce or in the production of goods for commerce to a substantial extent during the work week for which recovery is sought. In this connection, an employee may be within the act during one week in which he engages in interstate work and not within the act during another Building maintenance employees who worked part of time in building which was devoted to interstate production in substantial degree, and part of time in other buildings of employer, were entitled to judgment for overtime on the basis of the total hours of overtime in those weeks during which they performed any services covered by Fair Labor Standards Act.—Roberg v. Henry Phipps Estate, C.C.A.N.Y., 156 F.2d 958.

week in which he does no such work.[7] Where the employer is subject to the act with respect to a part of his activities, and there is no separation of the business subject to the act from the business not subject to it, the fact that a part of the work done by the employee may not have related to the employer's interstate activities does not preclude coverage under the act.[8] It has been held, however, that an employee working in both interstate and intra-state commerce must point out what part of his work was in interstate and what part in intra-state commerce,[9] and that, if the employer's operations are not an integrated effort for the production of goods for interstate commerce, the employee to bring himself within the act must show specifically that a substantial part of his mixed tasks consists of activities involving interstate commerce.[10]

Under the rule bringing employment in substantial part in interstate commerce within the coverage of the act, the phrase "substantial part" is not a phrase of mathematical precision.[11] The courts have refused to lay down any hard and fast rule or any fixed percentage in connection with the term "substantial,"[12] and it has been held that the term means the opposite of insubstantial or immaterial and may be less than fifty per cent.[13] In other words, the percentage of time occupied in covered work is not the decisive test but strong consideration must also be given to the nature of the employee's participation in the production of goods for commerce, that is, whether his work in that field is continuous, regular, and an integral part of his every day employment, or whether it is occasional, spasmodic, or casual in its nature.[14] So, where the employee's activities in connection with interstate commerce are frequent and recurring and have the character of continuity and are engaged in as part of his regular duties, he is within the act, even though he works only a relatively short time in interstate commerce.[15] On the other hand, where the employee's work in connection with interstate commerce is tenuous, incidental, insubstantial, or inconsequential,[16] and the time spent in performing

It has been held that, where there is no proof available as to the time worked in interstate commerce and that worked in intra-state commerce, the court would base the employee's compensation on the ratio the amount the interstate business of the employer bore to the intra-state business.—Tucker v. De minimis

(1) The maxim, De minimis non curat lex, was not applicable to exclude from coverage of Fair Labor Standards Act employees who worked in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce from fifteen minutes some weeks to more than forty-five hours other weeks, where such interstate work was of the type which they were hired to perform, and employer's interstate sales ranged from six per cent to fifty-five per cent of total sales.—Brown v. Minngas Co., D.C.Minn., 51 F. Supp. 363.

(2) Where seven per cent of employee's time was spent in interstate commerce during each day of each and every week checking invoices, freight, and bills of lading for employer engaged in transportation of goods by motor truck, the percentage of employee's time in interstate commerce was not so unsubstantial or "de minimis" as to deprive him of benefits of statute.—Southern Cal. Freight Lines v. McKeown, C.C.A. Cal., 148 F.2d 890, certiorari denied 66 S.Ct. 46, 326 U.S. 736, 90 L.Ed. 439, rehearing denied 66 S.Ct. 138, 326 U.S. 808, 90 L.Ed. 493.

duties of an interstate character is negligible,[17] he is not within the statute. An employee who is primarily engaged in intra-state work cannot bring himself within the act by an unauthorized extension of his duties into the field of interstate commerce.[18]

d. Particular Employees

(a) In general
(b) Maintenance employees of buildings

(a) In General

The Fair Labor Standards Act has been applied to numerous particular employees engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce.

As discussed supra subdivision a of this section, the provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act § 1 et seq, 29 U.S.C.A. § 201 et seq, apply to every employee engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce, and, where work of the requisite character is performed, the statute may apply to clerical and office employees,[19] culinary workers,[20] employees engaged in electric power generation and transmission,[21] factory employees generally,[22] employees engaged in ice production and servicing,[23] laborers generally,[24] lumber work-

Work held not substantial

Where five per cent of time of employees at central warehouse of corporation operating chain of retail drug stores was devoted to working on one and fifty-six hundredths per cent of goods of corporation in interstate commerce, a "substantial" part of employees' time was not devoted to interstate commerce.—Vogelpohl v. Lane Drug Co., D.C.Ohio, 55 F.Supp. 564.

rier,[49] but ordinarily the activities of watchmen are not so closely related to the movement of the commerce engaged in by the employer as to bring watchmen within the coverage of the act as "engaged in commerce."[50] Also, watchmen employed by a business engaged purely in intra-state business are not within the act.[51]

(b) Maintenance Employees of Buildings

The coverage of the Fair Labor Standards Act may extend to maintenance employees of a building occupied in whole or in substantial part by persons engaged in the manufacture or production of goods for commerce.

The coverage of the Fair Labor Standards Act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 201 et seq, may extend to maintenance employees of a building occupied by persons engaged in the manufacture or production of goods for interstate commerce,[52] or by central offices controlling the production of such goods elsewhere.[53] However, building maintenance employees are not within the act where the tenants of the building are in no way connected with the process of production of goods for commerce;[54] and, where tenants are engaged in interstate commerce, as distinguished from the production of goods for commerce, the maintenance employees are not by reason of their work so closely identified with the activities of the tenants as to come within the act.[55] So, where maintenance employees work in a building in which a bank does business, and such bank, although engaged in commerce, is not engaged in the production of goods for commerce, they are not covered by the act,[56] but it has also been held that in so far as a bank's business consists of preparing, executing, or validating bonds, shares of stock, commercial paper, bills of lading, and the like, it is engaged in producing goods for commerce so as to bring maintenance employees within the coverage of the statute.[57]

Where a building is occupied both by tenants engaged in producing goods for commerce and tenants not so engaged, maintenance employees may be within the act if a substantial proportion of the tenants are in interstate commerce,[58] but they are not within the act if less than a substantial proportion of the tenants are engaged in the production of goods for commerce.[59] In determining what is a "substantial portion" of the building, some decisions have adopted as a test whether at least twenty per cent of the rentable area in the building was de-

In view of less sweeping definition of phrase "in commerce" as compared with definition of phrase "production for commerce" under statute, interpretation of coverage under statute must be broader for employees engaged in servicing building in which production for commerce is carried on than for employees engaged in servicing building in which the tenants are engaged in commerce and not in production for commerce.—Convey v. Omaha Nat. Bank, C.C.A.Neb., 140 F.2d 640, certiorari denied 64 S.Ct. 638, 321 U.S. 781, 88 L.Ed. 1074.

Distributors

It has been held, however, that services rendered by building service employees for building tenants using building facilities to acquire goods from out of state suppliers and distribute them in substantial quantities to customers outside state were so closely related to physical movement of goods in interstate commerce as to be part thereof and covered by statute as "interstate commerce."—Schineck v. 386 Fourth Ave. Corporation, 49 N.Y.S.2d 872, 182 Misc. 1037.

§ 151(10). Learners, Apprentices, and Handicapped Persons

The provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act extend to trainees, beginners, apprentices, or learners if they are employed to work for compensation, but the administrator is empowered to grant special certificates for their employment at less than the general minimum wage.

The requirements of the Fair Labor Standards Act § 1 et seq, 29 U.S.C.A. § 201 et seq, extend to trainees, beginners, apprentices, or learners if they are employed to work for an employer for compensation.[62] Under the Fair Labor Standards Act § 14, 29 U.S.C.A. § 214, the administrator of the wages and hours division is empowered to grant special certificates for the employment of learners, apprentices, and handicapped persons at less than the general minimum wage,[63] and such provision means that employers who hire such persons and expressly or impliedly agree to pay them compensation must pay them the prescribed minimum wage, unless a permit not to pay such minimum has been obtained from the administrator.[64] However, the section does not imply that all instructors must get a permit or pay minimum wages to all learners since the section relates only to learners who are in "employment."[65]

The Fair Labor Standards Act contains numerous exemptions and such exemptions should be construed in accordance with the scope and purpose of the act and should not be enlarged to the point of obstructing the statutory purpose.

The Fair Labor Standards Act § 1 et seq, 29 U.S.C.A. § 201 et seq, was not drawn with the idea of making complete coverage of all employees engaged in commerce or the production of goods for commerce, but contains numerous exemptions.[66] The exemptions of the statute generally deal with employments of a character or with employees of a class to which application of the provisions of the act for minimum wages and maximum hours is either impracticable or impossible, or with employees in occupations in which the conditions of labor are regulated by other statutes, or with employees the greater part of whose labor is in intra-state commerce,[67] but congress intended not to exclude other employments or employees.[68] The terms of the statute relating to exemptions cannot be enlarged or diminished by rulings of the administrator of the wages and hours division,[69] and it has been held that the ultimate question of coverage under the act is a judicial question committed to the courts, and, therefore, that the administrator's definition of what may be substantial as to various exemptions under the act is not determinative of what is substantial as far as coverage of the act is concerned.[70]

The provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act dealing with exemptions should be construed in accordance with the scope and purpose of the act,[71] and they should not be enlarged to the point of obstructing the attainment of the result that congress was seeking to achieve.[72] The detail with which

Persons in training under direct supervision of regular employee of railroad doing same type of work in order to qualify for employment were not "learners" as contemplated by Fair Labor Standards Act, since they worked solely for themselves, whereas a learner is an employee who labors in the interest and for the benefit of employer and produces something or performs a service in employer's interest, but due to inexperience or some other handicap the product of his labor is inferior to that of an experienced worker.—Walling v. the exemptions are drawn in the act precludes their enlargement by implication,[73] and it has been held that the statute should be liberally construed to include all employees not expressly excepted from the act who reasonably may be deemed within its purview.[74] Exceptions to the coverage of the statute should be narrowly construed,[75] giving due regard to the plain meaning of the statutory language and the intent of congress,[76] and should be extended only to those who are plainly within their terms.[77] Persons claiming the benefit of exemptions must bring their case within both the letter and the spirit of the exemptions,[78] particularly when the exemption claimed is for an employee engaged in interstate commerce.[79]

Any declared intent of congress not to injure ailing industries by making them subject to the Fair Labor Standards Act may not be construed as indicating a general policy of exemption because a particular industry may not be financially prosperous.[80] The exemption of agricultural labor is not admissible as an argument to exempt labor in an industry from the operation of the statute.[81]

The question whether a given employee is exempt from the benefits of the act is a factual one dependent on the circumstances of the particular case.[82] Generally, in determining whether an employee is within the terms of the statute, the criterion is the character of work performed,[83] rather

The exemption of agricultural labor from the operation of the act could not be cited as an argument justifying a construction which would exempt labor in an industry from its operation, since both federal and state governments have recognized a marked difference between industrial workers and agricultural laborers.—Fleming v. than the title of the employee's position,[84] and where one indivisible part of the employer's business is exempt but the remainder is not, in applying the act, the nature of the employment of the particular employee is controlling.[85] It has been held that, where an employee is engaged both in exempt and nonexempt activities, and the time spent in each cannot be segregated, he is not exempt from the act,[86] and, as discussed supra § 151 (5), an employee engaged in the performance of both covered and noncovered work during the same work week must be compensated for all his work during the week in accordance with the standards prescribed by the act. As long as an employee is engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce for an employer subject to the statute, it is immaterial what type of work is being performed by the employee for a second employer who may be exempt from the act, and such employee is entitled to all the benefits of the act.[87]

The fact that exemption has been granted to certain employers under certain conditions does not mean that such employers may not be producers for commerce and within the coverage of the act under conditions not within the terms of the exemption.[88] So, when an exempt employer engages in activities different from those exempted, the employees in the nonexempt department of his business are subject to the act,[89] and it has been held that, where the exempt and nonexempt characteristics of the business are so intermingled as to be inseparable, the exemption is denied entirely.[90]

§ 151(12). —— Executive, Administrative, or Professional Employees

a. In general
b. Executive employees
c. Administrative employees

a. In General

The Fair Labor Standards Act exempts from its provisions as to minimum wages and overtime pay persons employed in a bona fide executive, administrative, or professional capacity, and it confers on the administrator the power precisely to define by regulation the terms used in describing the exempted class.

The Fair Labor Standards Act § 13 (a) (1), 29 U.S.C.A. § 213 (a) (1), exempts from its provisions as to minimum wages and overtime pay persons employed in a bona fide executive, administrative, or professional capacity,[91] and it confers on the administrator the power precisely to define and delimit by regulation the terms used in describing the exempted class.[92] The authority granted to define the terms constitutes a direction to the administrator to make a finding of fact as to what characteristics of employment will identify the exempt employees and distinguish them from the class of nonexempt employees,[93] and his definitions must be

Specific criteria
Under Fair Labor Standards Act provision exempting executive, administrative, or professional employees as such terms are defined by wage and hour administrator, congress intended to have specific criteria laid down by administrator by which employer and enforcement consistent with the statute and reasonable.[94] Regulations promulgated pursuant to the statutory directive have been held valid,[95] where the standards established thereby are supported by facts of common knowledge and are justified by practical administrative considerations;[96] and the administrator may adopt as criteria the amount of salary earned by the employee,[97] and the proportion of exempt work and nonexempt work which the employee performs.[98] It has also been held, however, that a regulation requiring that an employee be paid a certain sum per week in order to come within the exempt class is beyond the authority of the administrator and invalid.[99]

Regulations dealing with the exemption, if valid, must be regarded as defining and delimiting the statutory phrases and setting down absolute criteria through which the question of exemption must be determined.[1] The definitions have been held to have the force of law[2] and to supersede the common or popular understanding of the term, either in common usage or by standard dictionary definition.[3] So, all the conditions provided by the regulations for the determination of the status of an employee as exempt or nonexempt must be fulfilled before the exemption may be claimed.[4] It has also been held, however, that the administrator's definition will be followed only where it is within the limits of the fair and natural meaning of the words used in the statute.[5]

In accordance with the general rules as to the construction of exemption provisions under the Fair Labor Standards Act, as discussed supra § 151 (11), the exemption of executive, administrative, or professional employees must be strictly construed.[6] In determining whether an employee is within the exemption, each case stands on its own facts,[7] and the duties and activities of the employee must be looked to rather than the mere name attributed to the position.[8] The practical interpretation which the employer and employee placed on the employee's status is entitled to considerable weight.[9]

Professional employee. An employee is exempt from the minimum wage and overtime pay requirements of the Fair Labor Standards Act, 29 U.S.C.A. §§ 206, 207, as a professional employee, when and agency could determine with certainty whether employee fell within or without an exempted employment.—Walling v. Yeakley, C.C.A.Colo., 140 F.2d 830.

Apparently arbitrary line

Decision of wage and hour administrator fixing an apparently arbitrary line for determination of status as employee must be accepted unless wide of any reasonable mark, where line must exist and there is no mathematical or logical way of fixing it precisely.—Chepard v. May, D.C.N.Y., 71 F.Supp. 389.

b. Executive Employees

Under the provision of the Fair Labor Standards Act exempting executive employees from its operation, the administrative regulation defining the term "executive" generally is determinative of who may claim the exemption and all the conditions of the regulation must be satisfied to render the employee exempt.

Application of regulation

Decisions have construed and applied a regulation in substance providing that the term "professional" employee shall mean any employee receiving more than two hundred dollars a month who is engaged in work which is predominantly intellectual and varied in character, and requires the consistent exercise of discretion and judgment in its performance, and is of such a character that the output produced or the result accomplished cannot be standardized in relation to a given period of time, and whose hours of work of the same nature as that performed by nonexempt employees do not exceed twenty per cent of the hours worked in the work week by the nonexempt employees, except where such work is necessarily incident to work of a professional nature; and which requires, first, knowledge of an advanced type in a field of science or learning customarily acquired by a prolonged course of specialized intellectual instruction and study; or, second, predominantly original and creative in character in a recognized field of artistic endeavor.—Stanger v. Vocafilm Corp., C.C.A.N.Y., 151 F.2d 894, 162 A.L.R. 216—Hofer v. Federal Cartridge Corp., D.C.Minn., 71 F.Supp. 243—Aulen v. Triumph Explosive, D.C. Md., 58 F.Supp. 4.

(2) An employee who had Bachelor degrees from university in mathematics and architecture, to which was added three years of chemical engineering, who had four to seven draftsmen working under him, whose work required original and creative ability and special training, and who on quitting employment stepped into business for himself as an "industrial designer."—Phillips v. Federal Cartridge Corp., D.C.Minn., 69 F.Supp. 522.

(3) Machine designers who received more than two hundred dollars a month, who had taken prolonged special training, and whose work was predominantly intellectual and varied in character and required exercise of discretion and could not be standardized in relation to a given period of time and layout and detail phase of which work was a necessary incident to the more intellectual phase.—Aulen v. Triumph Explosive, D.C.Md., 58 F.Supp. 4.

(4) Senior draftsman engaged in preparing detail plans from original plans, preparing sections, plans, and elevations, designing the arrangement in the case of reinforced concrete of various members which were the components of the construction, and preparing "bills materials" to be used in placing orders with suppliers for the various component parts as required.—Dolan v. Day & Zimmerman, D.C.Mass., 65 F. Supp. 923.

Workers

The purpose of the act in relation to overtime pay for nonexempt employees is to grant right to overtime pay to that class of employees who come within commonly understood designation of workers as distin-

ployed in a bona fide executive capacity" generally is determinative of who is within the exemption,[12] and, where the component parts of the regulation are stated in the conjunctive, all the conditions must be satisfied to render the employee exempt.[13]

Thus the exemption attaches only where it ap-guished from managers, superintendents, foremen or bosses.—Rigney v. Wilson & Co., D.C.W.Va., 61 F.Supp. 801.

Persons held entitled to exemption

Infrequent exercise of power
(1) Fact that power to discharge or suspend employees for infractions of company rules was rarely exercised did not alter fact that authority existed and that supervisors' recommendations were given particular weight.—Anderson v. Effect of deductions
Where foremen were employed at weekly salaries, that deductions therefrom were measured by hours of absence did not convert their contracts of employment into contracts at an hourly wage in determining whether they were bona fide executive employees and not entitled to overtime compensation.—Smith v. Net earnings
Where employee was paid on a commission basis and had to pay, from commissions, wages of his helpers, and retained less than thirty dollars per week including social security and withholding tax, such fact was conclusive that employee was not exempt from the act as employed in a "bona fide executive capacity" regardless of gross amount of commissions.—Walling v. Regulation held not arbitrary
In order for administrative regulation regarding percentage of work not exempt from Fair Labor Standards Act, which will bring employee having both executive and nonexecutive duties within protection of act, to be "arbitrary" so as to render it invalid, the particular percentage selected must be unreasonable for purpose for which it is to be used; regulation fixing twenty per cent as criterion has been held not arbitrary.—Ralph Knight, Inc., v. Mantel, C.C.A. Mo., 135 F.2d 514.

Base on which percentage taken
The nonexempt work referred to in the regulation is not only the type of nonexempt work performed by employees under direction of the executive but is nonexempt work of any nature, and the base on which the twenty per cent is to be taken is the hours worked in the work week by the nonexempt employee under direction of the executive.—Dolan v. Day & Zimmerman, D.C.Mass., 65 F.Supp. 923.

that this last requirement does not apply where the employee is in sole charge of an independent establishment or a physically separated branch.[21] It has been held, however, that the administrator's definition will be followed only to the extent that it is within the limits of the fair and natural meaning of the words "bona fide executive capacity,"[22] and that an employee may be entitled to the exemption notwithstanding he earns less than the sum prescribed by the regulations.[23]

In determining whether an employee is exempt as a bona fide executive, each case must be determined on its own merits.[24] The court must look to the actual duties the employee performs and all the circumstances of the employment,[25] and the title given to an employee or the designation given to his employment is not conclusive.[26] The fact that an employee's compensation exceeds the amount fixed in the regulations as necessary in order to classify an employee as an executive,[27] or that he is prohibited from doing physical labor,[28] does not of itself make him an executive employee.

Generally, the word "executive" means one whose duties relate to active participation in control, supervision, and management of business, or one who administers affairs, or who directs, manages, executes, or dispenses,[29] but the term does not include one who does routine menial work,[30] or one whose duties are predominately devoted to actual manual labor.[31] However, the fact that an employee does some routine work incidental to his duties as an executive employee does not preclude his exemption if such routine work does not exceed the proportion fixed by the regulations.[32] So, also, where manual or ordinary tasks performed by an employee having executive duties are of supervisory or instructive type, they do not preclude his classification as an executive.[33] Although an employer may

Casual departures from supervisory work
The Fair Labor Standards Act did not intend that casual departures from strict supervisory work should be meticulously added together in order to determine whether an executive may have exceeded the 20 per cent. maximum referred to in regulation allowing overtime compensation to supervisory employees doing more than 20 per cent. of their work assign a man employed to take an executive position to work not of an executive character to train him to do the job he was hired to do, the employee may not be assigned to such work for a period of time longer than is conceivably necessary to train him properly so as to exempt him for such time from the operation of the statute.[34]

"Executive" and "administrative" distinguished. Although the terms "executive" and "administrative" are largely overlapping in common usage, for the purpose of exemptions under the statute "executive" is limited to persons whose duties include some form of managerial authority, actually directing the work of other persons, and "administrative" to persons performing a variety of miscellaneous but important functions in business.[35] While an administrator is not necessarily an executive within the statutory exemption, the term "executive" is broad enough to include one who also has administrative duties.[36]

c. Administrative Employees

The Fair Labor Standards Act exempts administrative employees from its provisions as to minimum wages and overtime pay, and regulations of the administrator have been held valid and binding in the determination of what employees are within the exemption.

Administrative employees are specifically exempted from the provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act §§ 6, 7, 29 U.S.C.A. §§ 206, 207, as to minimum wages and overtime pay,[37] and regulations of the administrator of the wages and hours division defining the term "employee employed in a bona

The term "administrative employee" ordinarily applies only to an employee who is compensated for his services at a salary or fee of not less than a prescribed sum per month,[41] and who regularly and directly assists an employee employed in a bona fide executive or administrative capacity, where such assistance is nonmanual in nature and requires the exercise of discretion and independent judgment;[42] or who performs under only general supervision, responsible nonmanual office or field work, directly related to management policies or general business operations, along specialized or technical lines requiring special training, experience, or knowledge, and the exercise of discretion and independent judgment;[43] or whose work involves the execution under only general supervision of special nonmanual assignments and tasks directly related to management policies or general business operations involving the exercise of discretion and independent judgment;[44] or who is engaged in transporting goods or passengers for hire, and performs, under only general supervision, responsible outside work of a specialized or technical nature requiring special training, experience, or knowledge, and has duties requiring the exercise of discretion and independent judgment.[45]

Training period

Where employee was hired as "production control supervisor" and was assigned to department in employer's plant to familiarize himself with operations carried on and it required about a month to train such supervisor and employee was kept in such department doing work of expediter for some four months, employee was entitled to overtime under the act throughout period during which he worked in the shop except for first month, and after leaving the shop, he was an administrative employee not subject to the act.—Crane v. Construction by general order

(1) General order of wage and hour administrator defining one employed in an administrative capacity as one assisting an employee employed in executive or administrative capacity, where such assistance is non-manual in nature "and" requires exercise of discretion and independent judgment, by the use of the word "and," requires that such assistance be both nonmanual and requiring exercise of discretion and judgment in order to qualify as an administrative employee.—Burke v. Lecrone-Benedict Ways, D.C.Mich., 63 F.Supp. 883.

(2) The general order uses "manual" in its regular connotation as meaning physical as to the use of hands in contrast to mental exertions only.—Burke v. Lecrone-Benedict Ways, supra.

Clerical supervisor who was concerned with computing quantities of material and arranging for delivery of materials to subcontractors, and who made recommendations to bona fide executive for purchase of material necessary for fabrication of parts, was exempt from overtime provisions of the act, as one assisting an employee in a bona fide "executive or administrative capacity," notwithstanding that supervisor did some clerical work incidental to his work in an administrative capacity. —Dolan v. tion, rather than the title of his position.[46] The extent to which discretion or independent judgment, and the duty of making recommendations are involved, is one of the most important elements in determining whether a person's work is of an administrative character,[47] but it is not necessary to the administrative status that the employee be constantly and continuously engaged in exercising discretion and independent judgment,[48] and in performing nonmanual labor.[49] The fact that the employer regards the work as requiring special training or experience, although not conclusive, is of considerable importance in determining whether the employee is engaged in an administrative capacity,[50] but work along specialized lines is not necessarily essential to the exemption.[51] The fact that an employee earns more than the sum prescribed by the regulation is not of itself conclusive that he is an administrative employee.[52]

§ 151(13). —— Employees Engaged in Local Retailing Capacity or as Outside Salesmen

The Fair Labor Standards Act exempts from its provisions as to minimum wages and overtime pay employees employed in a local retailing capacity or as outside salesmen.

Under the Fair Labor Standards Act § 13 (a) (1), 29 U.S.C.A. § 213 (a) (1), the requirements of the statute with respect to minimum wages and overtime pay do not apply to employees employed in a local retailing capacity.[53] This provision was designed to cover persons engaged in the actual sale of commodities and does not extend to employees whose work is entirely disconnected therewith.[54] The statute authorizes the administrator to define the term "local retailing capacity" and an employee, to be exempt, must come within the terms of a regulation, where such regulation is valid.[55] The administrator's interpretation of the regulation is of controlling weight in arriving at the correct meaning thereof in the absence of a showing that such interpretation is plainly erroneous or inconsistent with the regulation.[56]

Outside salesmen. Under the provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act § 13 (a) (1), 29 U.S.C.A. § 213 (a) (1), persons employed in the capacity of "outside salesmen," as the term is defined and delimited by regulations of the administrator, are exempted from the operation of the statute.[57]

Authority to make decisions

An employee possessing authority to make decisions on his own account without direction or instruction from others exercises "discretion and independent judgment" within regulation issued by wage and hour administrator, defining employment in bona fide administrative capacity within statutory exemption.—Ashworth v. E. B. Badger & Sons Co., D.C.Mass., 63 F. Supp. 710.

Differentiation between a mere clerk and one with actual "administrative" ability so as to be exempt from benefits of act lies largely in the exercise of discretion and independent judgment, and receipt of salary above that customarily paid to one engaged primarily in mere manual or clerical work.—Stanger v. Glenn L. Martin Co., D.C.Md., 56 F. Supp. 163.

Added work

An employee who, under the definition of "administrative" in regulation fulfills every requirement to make him exempt except that his work does not require him to exercise sufficient discretion and independent judgment, may become exempt when his added work requires additional exercise of discretion and independent judgment.—Dolan v. § 151(14). —— Retail or Service Establishments Engaged Mainly in Intra-State Commerce

a. In general
b. Retail establishments
c. Service establishments

a. In General

Employees of retail or service establishments the greater part of whose selling or servicing is in intra-state commerce are exempted from provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act as to minimum wages and overtime pay, and, in determining whether the exemption applies, each case must be governed by its own facts.

The Fair Labor Standards Act § 13 (a) (2), 29 U.S.C.A. § 213 (a) (2), exempts from its requirements as to minimum wages and overtime pay any employee engaged in any retail or service establishment the greater part of whose selling or servicing is in intra-state commerce.[58] The purpose of the exemption was, in view of the legislative history of the act, to make certain that establishments located near and doing occasional business across state lines would not be covered by the provisions of the act,[59] and the language of the exemption will be so construed as to carry out the legislative purpose.[60] Such provision creates an exception to the general scope of the act, and is subject to strict construction.[61] The exemption must be applied uniformly to all engaged in commerce or the production of goods therefor, and different industries or others cannot promulgate definitions which may exempt their members from provisions of the act.[62]

In determining whether an employer is exempt as a retail or service establishment, each case must be

The reasons for excluding an outside salesman are fairly apparent. Such salesman, to a great extent, works individually. There are no restrictions respecting the time he shall work and he can earn as much or as little, within the range of his ability, as his ambition dictates. In lieu of overtime he ordinarily receives commissions as extra compensation. He works away from his employer's place of business, is not subject to the personal supervision of his employer, and his employer has no way of knowing the number of hours he works per day.—Jewel Tea Co. v. Williams, supra.

Persons held within exemption

Salesman employed primarily to effect sales of employer's merchandise by soliciting customers at their homes, and devoting the greater part of time to salesmanship and only a small part to delivery of goods ordered, was "outside salesman" as defined by regulations.—Jewel Tea Co. v. Williams, supra.

Insufficiency of other exemption

Section 13 (a) (2) is a part of the act only because of the fear that section 13 (a) (1), in exempting employees regularly engaged in a "local retailing capacity," did not clearly exclude those employed by local retailers who are situated near state lines and who make occasional interstate sales.—A. H. Phillips, Inc. v. Walling, Mass., 65 S.Ct. 807, 810, 324 U.S. 490, 89 L.Ed. 1095, 157 A.L.R. 876.

governed by its own facts,[63] and it has been held that the nature of the establishment where the labor is performed and the type of work done ordinarily are controlling.[64] It has also been held, however, that the exemption depends on the nature of the business conducted by the employer rather than the kind of work performed by the employee,[65] so that all employees of the industry are exempt if any are exempt.[66] It has been held that the statute is to be interpreted as though it exempts retail selling or retail servicing establishments,[67] and that the "retail" character of an employer is not to be determined by the nature of the employer's business exclusively, but, also, by the question whether the final purchaser uses the service or commodity to satisfy a personal want or necessity or uses it to satisfy a business necessity.[68]

"Establishment." The word "establishment" as used in the provision exempting retail and service establishments is intended to be taken in its ordinary meaning,[69] and it is used in the statute as it is normally used in business and in government as referring to a distinct physical place of business rather than to an employer's entire business organization.[70] An entire business or enterprise may comprise several establishments within the meaning of the exemption provision,[71] and one branch thereof may not be exempt, although another is exempt,[72] notwithstanding both branches are located under the same roof.[73]

Predominantly intra-state business. The exemption in favor of retail and service establishments may apply, although the employer does some interstate business, especially where the establishment is located near state lines,[74] but the greater part of the selling or servicing of the employer's business must be in intra-state commerce, and the exemption may not be claimed where the business is predominantly interstate in character.[75] The term "greater part" has been held to mean more than fifty per cent of the whole, and, if such proportion of the business is intra-state in character, the exemption applies,[76] notwithstanding the interstate business is substantial in amount.[77]

b. Retail Establishments

The exemption in favor of employees of retail establishments is to be construed in the light of the purpose and history of the statute, and the term "retail establishment" has been held to refer to a business making retail sales in small quantities for profit to persons who consume or use the goods rather than to persons who buy to sell again.

In determining who is within the exemption in

Authority of administrator to define

The word "establishment," although used in the immediately preceding clause of the same section of Fair Labor Standards Act, is not among the words which administrator of the act is authorized to define, and the rule expressio unius est exclusio alterius is applicable.—Walling v. favor of employees of a retail establishment, the term "retail establishment" is to be construed in the light of the purpose and history of the statute,[78] and it will not be literally applied where such application would lead to results plainly at variance with the policy of the legislation as a whole.[79] In ascertaining the legislative intent with respect to the scope of the term, the court is not bound by the interpretation made by the administrator of the wages and hours division[80] or by definitions evolved and accepted by a particular industry and governmental agencies connected therewith, although such definitions may be considered.[81] The word "retail" must be given a uniform meaning.[82]

The term "retail establishment" as used in the statute refers to a business making retail sales[83] and is one that sells goods in small quantities for profit[84] to persons who consume or use the materials, rather than to persons buying to sell again.[85] The intent of the provision is to exclude from the scope of the statute only business that is of a purely local nature,[86] that is, to exempt small local retail establishments, such as grocery stores, drugstores, hardware stores, and clothing shops.[87] It has been held, however, that the fact that the aggregate of sales by several retail stores operated by one employer amounts to a considerable sum does not take such employer out of the classification of operator of a retail establishment.[88]

The exemption contemplates an establishment serving ultimate consumers beyond the end of the flow of goods in commerce,[89] and, to the extent that sales are necessary for the production of goods for interstate commerce, they generally are not "sales" to an ultimate consumer for his personal use and accordingly are not retail sales within the

Authority

Although interpretations of administrator of wage and hour division are entitled to weight, the act confers no authority on administrator to extend or restrict scope of provision of the act that its wage and hour provisions are not applicable to employees engaged in retail establishments, the greater part of whose selling is in intra-state commerce.—White v. Jacobs Pharmacy Co., D.C.Ga., 47 F.Supp. 298.

Per cent of sales

A rule adopted by wage and hour division of department of labor for purposes of administration of act, that establishment may be considered retail if more than fifty per cent of the dollar value of its total sales are retail sales, is not binding on court in any given case, since the question cannot always be decided by arbitrary measurement and necessarily depends on the facts in each particular case.—Stucker v. (2) The definition of a "retail dealer" by the solid fuels administrator for war, or under the terms of the bituminous coal code, or by the coal trade, is not controlling on congressional intent as to what constitutes a retail establishment under the Fair Labor Standards Act.—Walling v. Large establishment

The provision of Fair Labor Standards Act exempting from the wage and hour provisions of the act any employee engaged in a retail establishment the greater part of whose selling is in intra-state commerce was intended to apply only to ordinary retail stores and not to a large establishment shipping goods out of the state to two important retail outlets in another state.—Walling v. meaning of the statutory exemption.[90] It has been held, however, that the exemption is not restricted to establishments which sell to private individuals as distinguished from business enterprises.[91]

The fact that a business engages in processing incidental to retail selling does not alter its retail character so as to remove it from the category of a retail establishment exempt under the statute,[92] but an employer is not exempt where the processing of goods sold is not merely incidental to retail sales made by it.[93] Generally an establishment engaged in manufacturing operations is not a retail establishment even though the goods manufactured are distributed at retail,[94] but it has been held that manufacturing conducted by a retail merchant solely to serve his customers buying at retail over his counter, with no return except as a result of such sales, is incidental to the retailing so that employees engaged in such manufacturing are within the exemption of the statute.[95] Where an employer operates a manufacturing plant and a retail establishment at the same time, the employees engaged in the retail business may be exempt while the employees of the manufacturing department are not.[96] Where an employer maintains numerous retail stores and at the same time engages in warehousing and distribution of goods to such stores, the enterprise as a whole is not a retail establishment exempt from the statute with respect to all its activities,[97] and the employees of the warehouse and central office of the chain store system are within the coverage of the act.[98]

In accordance with the foregoing rules, the employees of particular businesses have been held exempt as employed in retail establishments[99] or have

Wholesalers. A wholesaler as distinguished from a retailer is not entitled to exemption.[2] Whether one is a wholesaler or operates a retail establishment depends on the nature of his business activities and not what he calls himself,[3] and the classification given his business by local law is not conclusive.[4] Whether an employer sells to those who sell again is the ordinary test for determining whether he is a "wholesaler."[5]

An employer who is primarily engaged in wholesale distribution but does some retail business is not exempt,[6] and it has been held that an employer whose nonretail sales exceed twenty five per cent of its monthly gross receipts may not be considered a retailer.[7] The retail branch of a business consisting of both wholesaling and retailing may not be considered a separate establishment for purposes of exemption where the proprietors treat both branches as one entire business with one set of books on

Essential distinction

A wholesaler is one who sells to another for resale, who in turn is a retailer in that he sells to a person who consumes or uses the object, and essential distinction is that person buying from a retailer is the ultimate user or consumer of the commodity and does not sell it again whereas one buying from wholesaler buys only for purpose of selling again, in which event he is a retailer, or, if he buys an ingredient or part to produce goods for sale, he is not a retailer but a producer of goods.—Zehring v. Utilities. It has been held that the exemption of employees of retail establishments does not apply to utilities furnishing electric, gas, or water supply,[9] even though they sell, install, and service gas or electric appliances as an incident to the business;[10] but it has been held, on the other hand, that the exemption may apply to a public utility which makes such sales as to constitute it a retail establishment.[11]

c. Service Establishments

The meaning of the term "service establishment" as used in the Fair Labor Standards Act exempting employees of such establishments is to be ascertained from the legislative history of the act and the context of the term, and generally it refers to an establishment which has the ordinary characteristics of a retail establishment except that services instead of goods are sold.

The term "service establishment" may have a multiplicity of meanings, and in determining the sense in which it is used in the provision of the Fair Labor Standards Act exempting employees of such establishments, the legislative history of the exemption and the context of the term must be ascertained.[12] The test in determining the application of the exemption is the primary business of the employer, not the particular occupation of the employee, since the exemption relates to employers only.[13] The service establishment contemplated by the statute is an establishment which has the ordinary characteristics of retail establishments except that services instead of goods are sold;[14] it serves customers indiscriminately as a business and performs work or labor on the person or property of the customer or serves his physical needs or desires.[15] In other words, it is an establishment the principle activity of which is to furnish service to the consuming public, such as hotels, garages, barber shops, laundries, tailor shops, and the like.[16]

The words "retail" and "service" are required to be interpreted similarly, so that the broader meaning of "service" may be restricted to a meaning comparable to that given the narrower term "retail,"[17] and accordingly, in proportion as the meaning of the word "retail" is restricted to sales made in small quantities to ultimate consumers to meet personal rather than commercial and industrial uses of these articles, it is correspondingly appropriate to restrict the word "service" to services to ultimate users of them for personal rather than commercial purposes.[18] The exemption contemplates an establishment serving ultimate consumers beyond the end of the flow of goods in commerce,[19] and, to the extent that services are necessary for the production of goods for interstate commerce, they generally are not "services" to an ultimate consumer for his personal use.[20] The exemption for service establishments is limited to those which sell services to consumers and serve consumers directly[21] and does not extend to those which render some service incidental to the business[22] or are primarily engaged in manufacturing[23] or in processing.[24]

In accordance with the foregoing rules, numerous particular businesses have been held exempt from the act as service establishments[25] or have been held not exempt.[26] So it has been held that the exemp-
